GOOD FELLOWSHIP CLUB MEETS WED. JAN. 10

Farmers To Form Testing Association

Farmers Meet Friday Night And Agree To Organize Association In Near Future.

14 READY TO JOIN AT ONCE

Some 30 farmers of the vicinity of Belmond met at the city hall last Friday evening, for the purpose of forming a dairy testing association. The men present were those more or less directly interested in better milk cows and better dairy products. County agent Edwards had been notified and was present with a Mr. Eves of Waterloo, who is connected with the dairy division of the state. He gave the audience a very interesting and educational talk along testing lines, and proved to them that by forming a testing association they could weed out the "boarders" from their herds make milking a better paying business.

Fourteen of those present signified their intention and willingness to join a testing association. They were:

Joe Sampson.
Chester Cullinan.
Leo Delaney.
Guy Baker.
Frank Christie.
Ira Christie
M. G. Luick
Max Baker
D. C. Ables.
Dell Luick
G. C. Baker
James Kurtz
Ed Hauge
Easton & Fetrow.

Twenty-six are needed to form a testing association. It is planned to secure the additional members needed here, but if this cannot be done, to secure them at either Kanawha or Klemme. When the association is formed, a man will be sent by the state—paid, however, by the association—who will visit each member once a month. He will weigh the feed fed each cow morning and night and figure the cost; take a sample of each cow's milk night and morning, weigh and test it, and average the figures up, thereby arriving at the production per month per cow, the cost, and the profit. It is the same method as used in Wisconin where dairying is developed to a high degree. This man will also advise regarding the best feeds.

A man will be sent by the state to help organize a testing association here in the near future. Anyone who is interested may see any of the men named for particulars as to the association and to join. This is a progressive move in the right direction and means better profits to the farmers.

Ed. Patton of Dows also gave a talk on dairy and poultry standardization which was highly interesting.

ANOTHER GOOD RECORD

Speaking of testing for T. B. and other tests, Dr. Brown recently tested 26 Holstein cows for M. J. Kerman that stood the test 100 per cent, not an animal having a trace of T. B. one reason given for this is that regular intervals new blood is introduced from some of the leading herds which have been tested. Thru building up a sturdy and disease-resisting herd this bunch ran as high in grade as 15-16. In August one of the cows had twin calves from a grade Hereford sire. As they were very weak the cow was premitted to raise them. The cow is very thin now, but the calves are a square, blocky beef type fit for the butcher and feed lot. Some of the other cows have had a year's test in the Klemme Cow Testing association, and during the year returned $5 to $6 for every dollar of feed consumed, with the per cent of butterfat running as high as 4, 5 and 6.

Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Martin and Albert, and S. D. Martin drove to Cambridge Saturday to visit at the Ketchum home. They returned Tuesday.

COMMUNITY CLUB

The Community Welfare club met at the library last Friday afternoon. On account of the holiday season only about thirty members were present. The secretary was instructed to write a letter of thanks to Henry Crist for his generous donation to the club charity fund. Also letters of appreciation to attorney Jensen and Loyd Skovlin for the good work they have been doing in the community and to let them know the club was standing back of them.

Mrs. J. J. Sharon led the afternoon lesson which was on Iowa writers. Iowa can well be proud of her list of famous writers. And during the lesson the club learned many things they never knew before that had been written by Iowa writers.

After the lesson, refreshments were served and a social hour enjoyed.

JENSEN NOW CO. ATTORNEY

Atty. J. M. Jensen of this city assumed his new duties as County attorney on Tuesday morning. Atty. Jensen will maintain his resident in Belmond making his home here, where his family will live, and he will have an office at the county seat dividing his time between the two places. J. M. is a capable, go-getting young man and the people of Wright County will have a good and efficient servant in him.

HAMPTON TEAM REINSTATED

The Hampton High School athleti department received notice last wee from the Iowa State High Schoo Association that the ban on th Hampton school would be lifted o January 1st, and consequently there was much rejoicing in that city. The school is again enabled to compete with other schools in the state in athletic contests, and is making great plans for copping the basket ball games this winter. The Hampton school was suspended this last fall for having and playing on its football team an ineligble player, Paul Davis of Hansell. The suspension of the school beat Hampton out of the state football championship in the estimation of many, as they had a wonderful team and were cleaning up on every town they tackled.

SOME PERFUME

It has always been said in newspaper circles that a reporter should have a good nose for news. There was a piece of news Saturday morning that didn't need a good nose to discover. In fact, the better your nose was, the worse off you were. A youngster caught a civet cat in a trap east of town, and brought it home alive. He wanted to sell it and on reaching town stopped at the first place he came to which was Waller's. He didn't get inside the door there, and that was the reception he got at each place where they saw him first. However, he was informed that Harve Sweigard wanted a skunk to play with his dog Jack, and he made for the postoffice. He entered the lobby and there he remained until Harve came to find out what was the matter. The boy and the skunk met Harve at the door, and the kid was ordered to git. He next went to Schneider's but Louie Krall saw him coming. He met Ed Rhodes on the street and chased him up an alley. He tried to get into the south side meat market but failed, and by that time he seemed to think that he had had enough fun. But, say, that post office gang all worked with clothes pins on their noses all forenoon and they were uglier than they usually are at Christmas time, and hat's saying a good deal. —Garner Signal.

GETTIN' BY PRETTY SLICK

To write this article and comply with the times and the law, is going to be a hard proposition. It has to do with something which the law says you mustn't talk about, in print anyway.

The merchants of a near by town had a trade extension and trade getting campaign recently, in which they-uh-well, in which Santa Claus played a part. You know, Santa Claus gives presents. Well anyway, the extension campaign was a huge success ,and as per arrangements and agreements therefore made. Santa Claus was on the job with two nice shiny presents for two unknown (and unnamed) people. In describing Santa Claus' visit, one of the newspaper said.

"The event of the day was pulled off at 3:00 o'clock. The parade started at the corner of Reeve and fourth streets and ended at the city park. For about 15 or 20 minutes things were exciting and everybody was holding their breath."

Which is a pretty slick way of giving the news and at the same time complying with the law.

F. C. Aldrich of Rowan was a business caller in the city on Monday afternoon.

JAMES WESLEY TREESE

James Wesley Treese was born on May 10, 1849, in Ohio. Later he moved to Illisois where on Jan. 11, 1872, he was married to Miss Allie Donley, of Ohio. To this union were born eight children, five of whom are living: Clifford, Mrs. H. H. Dochterman, Mrs. Howard Forestal, and Mrs Otto Madison of Belmond, and Howard of Baltimore, Maryland.

Mr. Treese came to Belmond about 43 years ago, and endured some of the hardships incidental to pioneer life. After coming here and remaining a few years he moved to Scotland county, Mo., where he lived about 18 years, then returning to Belmond where he resided until his death.

He united with the Methodist Episcopal church when quite a young man, and remained faithful to his church. Death came without warning Friday evening. He seemed to sleep away as his heart failed.

Mr. Treese had more than reached the limit of three score and ten, being at his death 73 years, seven months and 19 days old.

Funeral services were held at the Methodist church Wednesday afternoon with Rev Wilkinson in charge, and interment was made in Franklin Grove cemetery.

HEN THIEVES AGAIN

The chicken thieves with their auto truck are at it again. Recently they called at the John Chapman farm with the evident intention of making a clean up. John, however, had been warned to be on the look out and was waiting with a shotgun. His dog gave a bark and scared the thieves before John could get a good chance to try his aim, the thieves beating it for the car and going to less watchful parts. Too bad that John could not have given them a dose of the only medicine that is good for this disease. Next time may he have better luck.

BOHNING-HEGINGER

Christmas Day witnessed the marriage of Miss Galinda Marie Bohning daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Bohning of Belmond, to Mr. Benjamin Heginger, of Goodell, the ceremony taking place at high noon at the home of the bride's parents. Rev. A. H. Waalkes of the Reformed church, officiated at the service, which took place in the presence of the immediate relatives of the bride and groom.

Following the marriage ceremony, a sumptuous wedding dinner was served, and the happy young couple then left on a short honeymoon trip to Ackley, Cedar Falls, Sigourney and other points where they are now visiting relatives.

The bride is one of Pleasant township's best known and popular young ladies. She has made her home with her parents on the farm and has a host of friends who unite in extending congratulations.

Mr. Heginger is a well known young farmer of near Goodell, owning a farm west of that town, and he will take his bride there where they will be at home after February 1st.

EAGLE GROVE GIRL KILED IN AUTO ACCIDENT

Miss Agnes Nelson of Eagle Grove daughter of Mrs. Godfrey Nelson, was instantly killed just before Christmas in an auto accident between Eagle Grove and Goldfield. Mr. Nelson, his wife and three children and a relative were returning from Goldfield, and in passing another car Nelson drove off the grade. He managed to get back on the road again when he seemed to lose control of the car, and went into the ditch on the other side, turning over and skidding along the ditch. Miss Nelson was killed, while the rest of the party escaped without serious injury.

MORE FARMERS AS LAW MAKERS

Representation of farmers in Iowa House of Representatives was materially increased by the last election in November. Sixty-five are listed for the present Legislature, while two years ago there were but fifty-one in the lower house, a gain of fourteen. Of the 108 members of the house, over half are farmers. There are 14 farmers among the members of the senate this term, a gain of of one over two years ago.

AN APPEAL TO STAND BY

In taking up the cause of law and order against disrespect of law and a wide open community, the men who have started the movement to clean up Belmond should be given the united and hearty support of every decent lawabiding citizen. Personal grudges which might be held against anyone connected with the campaign should be laid aside, that a united effort may be made and the best results accomplished. There is none, and there should not be, any politics mixed in the affair. This claim has been made ,but it is utterly false. The men who started the movement were actuated by a disire for a better and cleaner community, and by disgust at the way things have been going. They must necessarily be ready to accept, as any agitator for better government must, the derision of a certain class. But they should ignore these ravings. There can be no two ways about this movement: Either you are for or you are against, cleaning up; either you are for booze or you are against it. You will be judged by your words and your actions. If you are against the booze gang, the lawless element, then say so, and lend, at least your moral support to the men who are fighting the battle.

Because the Independent has come out flatfootedly for law enforcement, and has takn a definite stand against the lawless element, it has been severely criticised and condemned by some. The statement has been made that sixteen subscriptions were cancelled in one day. This is absolutely false in every particular. That many have not been lost in the past month. The only ones lost which were directly traceable to the anti-booze stand of the Independent were those of Jack Finn and Guy Lynch. In their place two new ones were added the same day, and in all more new ones have been added than have been lost from any and all causes.

Let this be a finish fight. Either the rough necks are going to run the community and the law abiding people move out, or the decent people are going to get rid of the toughs There are no two ways about it, it is going to be one or the other. The churches are back of the clean-up, the business men are behind it, the Community Club has endorsed it—which side of the fence are you on? Do you want your young boys reared in an atmosphere of law violation, of disrespect for decency, of booze. Do you want your young daughters your wives, your sisters and mothers subjected to nasty remarks and vulgar stares from a gang of booze-soaked rummies as they go down the streets? Do you want decency, order and law, or do you want your town wide open, an invitation to the lower instincts of the human animal to run wild?

Where do you stand? If for law enforcement and a cleaner town. Than come out and tell the men who are fighting. Back them up! Give your support! "United we stand; divided we fall."

THE SHORT COURSE

Every live citizen will jump in and help boost for the Short Course to be held in Belmond soon. Such an institute cannot help but be a good thing for the community, and the more vim expended in making it a success the greater success it will be. Primarily it will benefit the farmer, but in doing that it benefits all, for what helps the farmer helps business also.

Short Courses have been held here before, some of them huge successes, and some of them not so good. It all depended upon the enthusiasm displayed. Let this one be a good one, and it can be if we all go after it in the right manner. Boost for the short course, work for and with it; and you will benefit yourself as well as the other fellow.

Happy New Year! Have you made out your income tax yet?

Also have you secured your 1923 auto license?

The way things seem to be going, a fellow will be taking chances if he sings that old favorite "One Keg of Beer."

Anyway, it will be perfectly in accord to render "How Dry I Am."

A lot of good shining New Year's resolutions are beginning to show signs of rust by this time.

Wonder if there is any danger of overloading the water wagon.

AUTO ACCIDENT NEAR ALGONA SUNDAY EVE

A terrible auto accident happened Christmas eve about four miles east of Algona in which Hebrert Calkins of Fort Dodge, a brother of Rev E. Dale Calkins, pastor of the Congregational Church at Britt, was killed. Rev. Calkins and his brother who was a singing evangelist, had attended a meeting at Whitemore and were on their way to Britt. The lights on their car had gone out and they met a car from Mankato which had no lights. Both cars were going at a fair rate of speed when they met in head-on collision with such force that both cars were ditched and wrecked.

Mr. Herbert Calkins was thrown through the windshield of his brother's car onto the pavement, and seriously injured. It is also reported that another car coming along before he was picked up ran over him. He was taken to the Algona hospital and died at 4 o'clock Christmas morning.

Rev. Calkins and the parties in the other car were not seriously injured. They were also taken to Algona and cared for at the hospital. Both cars were totally wrecked.—Garner Signal.

BARBERS GO BACK TO THEIR OLD PRICES

There was considerable comment and a lot of pleasant joshing when the barbers posted signs Saturday that prices had gone back to haircuts 50c and shaves 25c. Now here is a matter that ought to be controlled by the barbers and we don't blame them for asking and getting a price that will allow them a living. They state that under the new price of 20c for shaves and 40c for haircuts they continually run behind, and furthermore that the number of people they worked on during the rate was actually less than it had been before. What were they to do when the money received did not take the place of the expenditures but to raise their price to a level where they could live and not run behi[nd]. It is a sad thing that the far[mer] cannot contol the price he gets [for] crops produced. Some way ought [to] be devised that he could, but t[his] seems to be a big problem. A[ny] business that cannot get enough [out] of their business to live would bet[ter] close shop and we are with the ba[r]bers when they run their own bu[si]ness and charge enough to ma[ke] ends meet.—Britt News-Tribune.

OLD AND WARY ANIMALS ARE HARD TO TRAP OR SHOOT

It is one thing to hunt predatory animals in practically virgin territory, and make a spectacular killing and quite another to go into a district where only the wicked old offenders that have eluded everybody are left to catch. Hunter John N. Martin was sent by the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture to some sheep ranges near Plainview, S. Dak., adjoining the Cheyenne Indian Reservation, and found that during the preceding winter and spring the country had been hunted and trapped over by bounty hunters, with the result that all pups and young animals, or those easy to take, were gone, sheep losses, nevertheless, were occurring constantly.

Working steadily for two and a half months, Hunter Martin took 35 coyotes and 2 bobcats, all old animals. About two-thirds of them bore evidence of having been in traps from which they had escaped, or of having been shot and wounded at some previous time. In addition to this kill, Martin reported that 59 poisoned baits were taken. The bounty system has been abandoned inmany places as a result of demonstrations by the Biological Survey, as it has been found that better results in stopping live-stock losses are obtained when a hunter is hired to give all hiis time to hunting, trapping, and poisoning and is held responsible for destroying the actual live-stock killers.

The world is full of men who will dance attendance upon a flirt and then waltz up to the altar with a sensible girl.

"It was during the short skirt period," begins a story; and a lot of people will wonder why the past tense.

Lighting Bills Are Higher In January Than In July

IN July, You have your evening meal, do the dishes and sit out on the porch or in the yard and visit by daylight. You turn on the electric light for only a few minutes while getting ready for bed.

IN January, You prepare the evening meal and eat it by artificial light. The family sits around in the living room for several hours reading and visiting. Some go to their rooms to read or study.

IN July, You spend many of your evenings out-of-doors and away from home.

IN January, It is too cold and sloppy out. You are at home more.

IN January, You frequently use electricity for lighting in one or more rooms for an hour in the mornings.

IN July, You don't burn porch lights because they attract mosquitoes and other insects.

IN January, The porch light gives a homey comfortable aspect to your property and cheers the wayfarer on the street.

IN July, At your office or store or factory you seldom need artificial light before closing time.

IN January, You frequently turn on the lights for an hour or maybe two hours before the business day is ended.

IN July, The weather outside is usually sunshiney and bright. You never think of turning on electric lights during the day.

IN January, Bleak cloudy days occur. Often you burn the lights in the house or office or store, just to cheer yourself.

THERE ARE FOUR TIMES AS MANY ARTIFICIAL LIGHTING HOURS IN JANUARY AS IN JULY.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

New Soil Acidity Test

A new test for soil acidity has been perfected which has the advantage of showing the results quickly and at the same time indicating the degree of acidity.

The old litmus paper test was fairly rapid but gave no idea of the degree of acidity. The Truog test used by many county agents was good in the latter respect, but it was necessary to boil the soil sample.

A quantity of the Richorpoor solution as it is called, has been secured by the county agent and tests will be made throughout the county.

Arrangements are being made for a soil testing demonstration in each township in the county when all samples which are brought to the meeting will be tested free of charge.

Tuberculosis in Children

Leading medical authorites state that a general summary of investigations made in the United States, Great Britian, and Germany, show that approximately twenty-five per cent of the general tuberculosis in children under five years of age comes from infected cows' milk, and is therefore of bovine origin. These investigations also show that approximately sixty per cent of the bone tuberculosis, and seventy per cent of the abdominal tuberculosis in children under five years of age comes from cows' milk. Many of our leading medical authorites now maintain that much of the tuberculosis in natural life originates during childhood from infected milk, but the disease remains dormant until some illness or injury reduces the vitality of the person infected in early life, and the disease begins to manifest itself, progressing further, frequently terminating in the death of the patient.

The greatest danger to children from this source of infection is when the vitality is lowered through malnutrition or any other cause. In the Paris, Illinois case, where five children out of a family contracted tuberculosis from the milk of one cow, it was quite apparent that the children were not fully nourished.

State Wide Farmers' Debate

Much interest is being evidenced over Iowa in the question selected for the farmers' debates this coming winter. It is "Resolved that the producers contract is essential to the greatest success of cooperative marketing."

The rural organization section of the Extension department at Ames is directing a contest in which township teams will be selected and intertownship debates held following the selection of the best township team to represent the county laer in the district debates. The final state debates will probably be held in March.

This is a well belanced question of interest to rural communities. We might very profitably return to more debates and discussion in our township meetings.

Lincoln township is the only community in Wright county which has taken an active interest in this debate.

O. E. Bradfute a Dirt Farmer

Oscar Edwin Bardfute, newly elected president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, is one of Amarica's best known and most progressive famrers. He lives on the old home farm near Xenit, Ohio, where his grandfather was one of the early settlers.

Mr. Bradfute has served his second term as vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. He is also president of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation and one of the trustees of the Ohio state university. Mr. Bradfute is a stockman and farmer and has specialized in pure bred beef cattle as senior member of the firm of D. Bradfute & Son, world-famous breeders of the Aberdeen Angus cattle.

When the farm bureau movement came along Mr. Bradfute was one of the first men to see that it was founded on a rock and bound to sweep the country. He was drafted into leadership, and after serving the organization for two years as vice president, is one of the leading figures in the organization.

J. W. Coverdale Chosen Secretary

John W. Coverdale was again chosen executive secretary of the American Farm Bureau Federation to serve for 1923. Mr. Coverdale has been one of the pioneer workers in the farm bureau movement. He started with the beginning to the farm bureau work in Iowa as state county agent leader. After the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation was organized he was chosen executive secretary and after the organization of the American Farm Burerau Federation he was chosen secretary of the bigger organization. These advancements speak well for his work of leadership in this great movement.

At the recent annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation they paid special tribute to his work by the following resolution: Resolved ,that a vote of appreciation be given to John W. Coverdale for his very efficient services to the American Farm Bureau Federation during his term as secretary. We wish to pay a testimonial to the high character of his work, in all interests that pertain to the success of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Cow Testing Association

The farmers of the Belmond community who are interested in dairy production met at the city hall last Friday evening for the purpose of organizing a Cow Testing association.

John P. Eves, state dairy expert of Waterloo, who was the principal speaker at this meeting, gave a very interesting talk on the dairy work throughout Iowa Mr. Eves explained thoroughly the plans of organization to be used in forming a cow testing association and seemed to think that with the interest which has already been created in and around Belmond there will be no difficulty in organizing an association of this kind.

According to Mr. Eves it is necessary to have twenty-six members in the association in order that the cow tester may spend one day at each farmers place. The object of the association is to check up the production of each cow once a month by weighing the milk and testing for butter fat content. Experience has shown that this is the only method by which one is able to know what a cow is producing and one big advantage is that when the cow is sold she is sold on a definite record as to her production qualities.

Considerable interest has developed in the Belmond community during the past year in the dairy industry, there having been four or five carloads of dairy cattle shipped into the community. With this interest which has already been aroused in the dairy industry in this particular community it is quite probable that a cow testing association will be organized in Belmond. This is evidence that dairying is becoming more popular than ever.

FORD SALES RECORD BROKEN

According to a statement issued by the Ford Motor Campany deliveries of Ford cars and truck to retail buyers during the month of November totaled 106,327. This is a new high sales record that has never before been approached by the campany at this season of the year and one which stands out in marked contrast to the November, 1921, retail delivery figures which totaled slightly over 58,000 cars and trucks.

For eight consecutive months, beginning with April 1st of this year, retail deliveries have exceeded 100,000 Ford cars and trucks each month the accumlated total for the first eleven months of 1922 being approximately 1,200,000. While the company points out that it is not unsual for Ford retail sales to exceed the 100,000 mark during the spring and early summer months when the demand is at its peak, the manner in which business has held up thruout the balance of the year is without precedent.

Credit for this remarkable showing is attributed by the Ford Motor Company to the many improvements which, have lately been made on Ford cars and particularly to the new low level of Ford prices, recently put into effect. These new low prices not only broaden the field of prospective Ford purchasers but go still further in making the Ford car the best value from the stand point of the retail buyer that it has ever been.

Altho the Ford factories have been operating at capacity for the past eight months, sales have equalled production and judging from the unsual manner in which orders are coming in at this season of the year Ford dealers will be unable to accumulate an adequate stock of cars during the winter months for delivery next spring.

In the opinion of the Ford Motor Company, November sales are an indication that many prospective purchasers, realizing the exceptional value now being offered in Ford cars, are beginning to anticipate an unsual spring demand and are, therefore, placing orders during the fall and will continue to do so thruout the winter to avoid disappointing delays in delivery later on. While this will steadily increasing demand for Ford cars is nevertheless sure to create an acute shortage as the season advances.

Accordingly, the Ford Sales Organization is urging prospective Ford purchasers to arrange for delivery during the winter months in order that the demand next spring will be relieved as far as possible.

FIGHT BEGINS ON BONUS LAW

Suit to restain State Treasurer W. J. Burbank from the sale of the soldier bonus bonds and the executive council from levying the taxes for payment of the sum was brought in the Polk county District court by Senator Henry W. Grout, of Waterloo. The suit was filed by the attoneys of Senator Grout, the firm of Farrish, Cohen, Guthrie & Watters, of Des Moines.

Attorney Parrish said he would not ask for advancement of the case and would not start arguments of the case before the latter part of next week. With this delay, the case may not be appealed to the Supreme court in time to be heard at the January term unless a special date is set by the high court, for the hearing of the appeal.

In view of the importance of the case it is probable that the attorneys will ask for a full bench hearing, which would require a special date for this case, as the regular full bench for the January term does not meet until April.

The filling of the suit will naturally stop all bidding for the bonds and it is probable that the treasurer will cancel the sale date fixed by him. It will be impossible for him to fix a new date for selling until he learns something about the time a decision may be expected in the case.

It is probable that the case will be heard by Judge Lester L. Thompson in the district court as he is expected to assume the equity division on January 2nd. Judge Thompson has declared that he will require that the case be fully argued before he makes a decision.

The petition of Senator Grout asks that the state treasurer and the executive council be restained from carrying out the provisions of the bonus law on the ground that it is void and unconstitutional. Seven grounds are set forth by the plaintiff why they should be declared invalid, most of these dealing with alleged violations of the state or federal constitutions.

While the test suit is being tried the bonus board will continue its work of passing on applications of former soldiers. The applications were mailed out to legion posts and it is believed that many applications will be filled out and returned to the board before the end of the week. Gen. Harry E. Wilkins, executive secretary of the board, stated that none of the applications would probably be passed upon of copying records still remains to be done and when this is completed General Wilkins expects to file and number the first batch of applications before passing upon any of them. He expressed the opinion that 50,000 of the applications may be passed upon and the warrants be written before any of them are sent out, as it is improbable that the warants will be sent to the soldiers until the bonds are sold and the money is in the treasury.

Humboldt Republican.—Some time ago this paper commented on the suit brought by J. M. Olesen to have certain portions of his farm set outside the corporation of Humboldt. This paper said that the act presumably was to escape the high taxes of the municpality. Mr. Olesen says that the idea of taxes had nothing to do with the petition. He calls attention to the Humboldt ordinance that no hogs may be kept within the city limits if anyone objects to their presence. It is well known that his hog houses and barns are within the city limits if on his farm. If anyone should complain he would have to remove his silos, hog houses and barns, and he does not like to take the risk. He also says that the corporate limits and the school district do not follow, and that being outside the corporation will have no influence on his school taxes, and that the school taxes are what are excessive in Humboldt. There is a lot of truth in what he says and the Republican regrets if it misintrepreted his move.

Celebrate Silver Wedding

On Wednesday of last week Mr. and Mrs. Joan Staltlander observed their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary by entertaining a few friends at their home in the afternoon. The guests were composed of the Sunday School teachers of the Reformed church, the pastor and family and a few close friends. The afternoon was pleasantly spent and a good time is reported. Refreshments consisting of ice cream and cake were served.

The pastor, Rev. Pannkuk made a few fitting remarks suitable for the occasion. A number of beautiful and useful gifts were presented to this worthy couple, accompanied with good wishes and congratulations. In the evening a chirivari crowd gathered to remind them of the wedding day twenty-five years ago, by giving the usual "serenade," thus making the occasion seem more real. We join with the friends, wishing Mr. and Mrs. Staltlander many more happy wedded years.

After being urged to announce a meeting of the E. I. C. E. in the basement of the church, and that the time would be 7:30 sharp a slight feeling of disappointment seemed to be in the air when all but the President and a few others had made their appearance.

A few remarks were passed, when the pastor and his wife were called back to their parsonage by their son.

Imagine their surprise to find that the old rug in the parlor had disappeared and in its place a beautiful new rug. The surprise was complete. Though we do not feel worthy of all the kindness shown to us by this company of young people; for we had already been well remembered at Xmas. With some real substancial gifts such as cash beside several sacks of flour from our merchants.

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks for all you have done for us during 1922 and hope that in all things we may be able to measure up to your expectations during the balance of our stay in Meservey.

COURT HOUSE NEWS

Monitor—Tuesday was a busy day at the county treasurer's office, a land office business being done in the matter of automobile licenses. The total for the day was over 250. To date nearly 1300 have been issued. It is expected a total of 4000 plates will be required. Seven clerks were on the job.

Mrs. Del Sanders of Eagle Grove, who has been receiving treament at Iowa City is to be transferred to the hospital at Cherokee.

The hog case of Severe vs. Sams it still occupying the entire attention of the court. The defendants rested their case Tuesday afternoon after a full week in giving testimony. Over two days of that time was consumed in the examination of Lynn Sams alone and regardless of the outcome of the case he made an exceptionally fine witness. To be questioned by a half dozen able lawyers for that length of time is no easy task. Most people would get pretty well confused after a grilling of a couple of hours. Mr. Severe went on the stand late yesterday afternoon and it is probable the case will be concluded by Friday.

The following births are reported the past week:

Thirteen Wright county couples were married during the past week, all but the last three mentioned couples having secured marriage licenses from clerk Goslin:

O. B. McGowan, West Union.
Beatrice Leinbach, Belmond.
Albert Pusha, Blairsburg.
Nellie Bowman, Blairsburg.
Chester Moellering, Rowan.
Thelma Brooks, Rowan.
Ben Heginger, Kanawha.
Galinda Bohning, Belmond.
Raymond Miller, Eagle Grove
Edna Skogeboe, Story City.
James R. Groom, Hampton.
Celia Azeltine, Rowan.
Conrad Hinkel, Eagle Grove.
Hazel Snyder, Eagle Grove.

Rosa Belle Garman, Lincoln Neb.
Shirley Ketchum, Clarion.
Mildred Duffy, Rowan.
Lester Rossman, Clarion.

As the result of a little shooting affair at Dows Christmas night William McGwire languishes in the county jail at Hampton. Several bullets were fired at a young man by the name of Johnson but none took effect. A little hootch is said to be responsible for the trouble.

Herbert Bige of Webster City, who was found guilty at the October term of the Wright county district court of larceny of merchandise from the Wheeler store in Woolstock is in jail again. The Daily News says officers made a raid on the apartment occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Bige and took into custody Mr. and Mrs. Bige, Roy Patterson and Mrs. Bige's sister, Miss Naomi Purvis. Bige and Patterson are both lodged in jail on a charge of bottlegging and their hearing will be held next week. A quantity of liquor was taken in the raid all of which was cleverly concealed. A portion was found on the rough framework of the table and more was found hanging out of the windows by cords. Bige has appealed from the findings of the jury in his Woolstock case and is now out on bond pending the result of his appeal. A bootlegging charge is not a very good recommendation for a fellow already convicted of larceny.

Two Dows young men were bound over to the grand jury Saturday by Justice Triggs. They stand accused of stealing fourteen muskrat hides from a Dows man, who found that the skins had been sold to a buyer at Williams. O. F. Peterson, a local buyer, later purchased a consignment of furs at Williams and the original owner traced his hides to Clarion and claims to have identified them by certain marks, some of the tacks used in stretching the furs being found in the skins. Each of the young men were held on two counts, breaking and entering a building and larceny from a building. Their bonds were fixed at $1500 which was furnished and the defendants given their release until the February term of court.

A theory can never overthrow a fact; but it can slaughter a lot of people trying to—or impose immense misery on them.

WHY USE WOOD FOR FUEL

"In the seventeen states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota. Iowa and Missouri, the rural population of about 20,000,000 is estimated to use about 18,000,000 tons of coal a year. If by substituting wood, one-quarter of the coal burned by farmers and one-tenth of the coal burned by villages could be saved, the total saving would amount to nearly 3,000,000 tons, or between 65,000 and 70,000 carloads"

Iowa has from 2 and 2½ million acres of timber land and over 200,000 acres of planted woodlots. In 1914 Iowa used a total of about 1,500,000 cords of fuelwood. During recent years the consumption probably has been greater. If Iowa were to use 3,000,000 cords of wood a year, it would be the equivalent of releasing about 1,000,000 tons of coal.

The use of wood for fuel:

Saves transportation.

Utilizes wood that would otherwise go to waste.

Releases coal for other essential industries.

Releases cars for hauling other freight, and relieves the congestion which is bound to occur on our railroads this winter.

The industrial situation again has brought about scarcity of coal supplies. The man who has to pay for coal at present, if he can get it at all, must burn every grain of dust actually to get anywhere near his money's worth out of it. The actual heating value of wood and its cost as fuel are again matters of importance to anyone who has a wood supply handy.

On nearly every farm at present a minimum outlay of actual cash is necessary. Even though on paper the cost of burning coal may appear cheaper because of the right the farmer has to make a charge for his labor, it may be that the bank balance actually will be a little larger if the farmer uses some of his labor to produce the winter's fuel supply and burns wood which he has on the place instead of buying coal. Such labor is put in during that part of the year when the farmer wants to employ his time profitably.

HUMAN NATURE

We say to others, 'Swat the flies, for in these pests great danger lies. They are the national disgrace; they carry germs from place to place. They serve no good or useful ends, but fill the boneyard with our friends. So buy yourself a swatting stick and make the flies look pretty sick." Such logic we are preaching strong the whole blamed, blooming summer long; but do we swat the buzzing crew? No; we have something else to do! And that is human nature, girls; we're glad to hand out wisdom's pearls, but when it comes to doing chores we recommend to other gores, we don't sail in, our souls enthused, but say we'd rather be excused.

We say, "The grocer is a crook and we must bring the man to book. He puts cheaper sugar in his sand, and dopes his salt to beat the band. He thinks ten ounces make a pound, and when we ask for coffee, ground, he grinds up tanbark in his mill and calls it coffee in his bill. He sends us wilted beans and peas, and ancient, acrobatic cheese, and butter strong enough to spar or use the horizontal bar. The grocer ought to be in jail; he robs us of our hard kale, and grins with foul and fiendish mirth when he has pushed us off the earth." And then we go and sell some gink a mine we know is on the blink, or take him fondly by the arm and trade him hot air for his farm, or catch a widow unwares and sell her fifty Belgian hares. For this is human nature son; we all are after easy mon, but how it hurts when some base cuss projects the harpoon into us!

We say, "We hate these summer days, and lamentation we shall raise; there is no sense in sizzling heat that fries a man from lid to feet and cooks his spare ribs in the grease, and undermines his mental peace. We'd like to live upon a floe and revel in eternal snow, and have a walrus for our fare or musk ox boiled or toasted bear." But when the wintry tempest blows and chills our side boards and our nose, we say that winter is a fake, a sad, protracted, dismal ache. We sing the joys of summer, then, and wish that it would come again. For that is human nature lad. The thing at hand is always bad; the thing a million miles away is what we long for day by day. --By Walt Mason, from Judge.

Hands—Are yours always clean? Not just free from the soil of the streets or from work, but free from the soil of germs that bring disease?

You may have a hard cold; perhaps you cough or sneeze in the palm of your hand, then pick up silverware, a coin or lead pencil. Thus, the cold germ is carried on to the next person who comes in contact with those same articles; your hand was the actual transmitter of the disease.

That is the way school children in the same grade often have the same disease. They use lead pencils, books and playthings in common, but this practice should be discouraged.

A tubercular patient often gives off the germ while hanging to a strap in a crowded street car. The next person clinging to that strap may later put his finger into his mouth, and thus the germ is taken internally. This is also a common way of transmitting skin diseases.

Therefore it is the duty of every man, woman and child, whether or not they have some communicable disease, to wash the hands frequently, and always before each meal. As a protection against germ soil on the hands, wear gloves while riding on public carriers.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

Economical housewives take pleasure in remodelling old garments so they look like new, and it is a saving to make over clothing when the materials are appropiate in pattern, color and texture, good enough to stand longer wear and when the work of remaking is not greater than the cost saved.

This preparation is essential for remodelling: careful ripping, removing all old thread; mending worn places, through brushing, sponging, washing or dyeing and careful pressing. In the latter step care must be taken not to alter shape. Silk should be pressed while damp, with a moderately hot iron. Wool should also be pressed while damp, using heavy cloth over garment. Too hot an iron stiffens the material.

If you dye cloth, be sure that the material is strong enough to stand up under the heat and boiling; it never pays to dye old silk as it usually rots or splits during the process.

These are some suggestions for remodelling: from a woman's suit girl's dresses, a one piece dress for a woman or little boy's suits can be made; a woolen skirt remodels into coat or trousers for child or blomers; wash skirts make attractive middies and silk waists can be remade into camioles, collars and cuffs, guimpes for children's jumper dresses.

In making griddle cakes and muffins, 1½ cup of bread crumbs may be substituted for 1 cup of flour.

Keep the baby warm this winter by remaking your old cotton blankets into crib covers. Bind the edges with sateen or pretty tape.

Soak dried fruit 12 hour, then cook for 10 minutes in the water the fruit soaked in, this enriches the flavor.

IS IT ANY WONDER

A man was one day visiting a lunatic asylum and while walking in the grounds he met a gent to whom he said:

"Well, how did you get here?"

The man replied: "Well, sir, you see. I married a widow with a grown-up daughter, and then my father married my wife's daughter; that made my wife the mother-in-law of her father-in-law, and my father became my stepson. Then my stepmother, the daughter of my wife, had a son and that boy of course was my brother, because he was my father's son; but he was also the son of my wife's stepdaughter, and therefore her grandson and that made me the grandfather of my stepbrother. Then my wife had a son so my mother-in-law, the step-sister of my son is also his grandmother because his stepsister is his wife; I am the brother of my own son, who is also the son of my step-grandmother; I am my mother's brother-in-law; my wife is her own child's aunt; my son is my father's nephew, and I am my own grandfather. That's one reason I am here sir."—Exchange.

The Rock Island train, the fast Klondyke, out of Titonka ran into an auto driven by a farmer near Belmond, as the train was pulling out of that city bound for Dows. The train was manned by Engineer Kester and fireman Lindholm, with Conductor Hanley in the rear. They moved out slowly and cautiously as they proceeded south on their journey at a two-mile rate when they struck the auto driven by the farmer, throwing it at one side close to a near by ditch, demolishing and damaging the fenders only, the accident occurring as the crew were leaving the depot with their train. Very little damage, if any to the engine was reported. On account of the accident the train has been arriving anywhere from one to six hours late. —Topic.

The BLIND MAN'S EYES

BY

WILLIAM MacHARG EDWIN BALMER

Illustrations by R.H. Livingstone

COPYRIGHT BY LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY.

A rich but universally respected western man is murdered in his automobile. The crime is accomplished with such stealth that even the chauffeur is not aware of it. Some months previously an eastern business associate, but not an intimate of the western man, had met death in an equally mysterious manner. There is absolutely no clew to the murder and no apparent motive for the second crime.

Basil Santoine, a blind lawyer, with that remarkable inner perception frequently developed by the sightless, while traveling on an eastbound train from Seattle in the company of his daughter and his confidential secretary, is murderously assaulted in his berth. Some features of this assault are more mysterious than either of the other crimes.

There is no superdetective nor scientific investigator to deduce infallible theories fastening the guilt upon the right party or parties. Police efforts are futile and succeed only in fouling the trail, involving innocent parties and increasing the complications. The only tangible clews seem to point to one Philip Eaton, a mysterious young man, who was aboard the train. There is also a suspicion that he may have been connected with the murder of the rich man in Seattle.

Apparently against all dictates of sense and safety, Eaton is made a guest in the sumptuous home of Santoine. Here the mystery deepens to an extraordinary degree and the big queries arise: Who is Philip Eaton; what is the past of this strange man; what intuition or reasoning draws the blind man to him in face of the danger of his presence; in what way is Eaton connected with the sinister events which afterward occur in the Santoine home; what explanation is there for the growing interest of Harriet Santoine in the man who is believed to have made an attempt upon her father's life?

Here are mystery and romance different from anything you ever have encountered. The outcome of events and solution of the mystery are as unexpected as anything you possibly can imagine.

CHAPTER I

A Financier Dies.

Gabriel Warden—capitalist, railroad director, owner of mines and timber lands, at twenty a cow-puncher, at forty-eight one of the predominant men of the Northwest coast—paced with quick, uneven steps the great wicker-furnished living room of his home just above Seattle on Puget sound. Twice within ten minutes he had used the telephone in the hall to receive the same reply—that the train from Vancouver, for which he had inquired, had come in and that the passengers had left the station.

It was not like Gabriel Warden to show nervousness of any sort; Kondo, the Japanese doorman, who therefore had found something strange in his telephoning, watched him through the portieres which shut off the living room from the hall.

Warden turned suddenly and pressed the bell to call a servant. Kondo entered the room; he noticed then that Warden's hand, which was still holding the watch before him, was shaking.

"A young man who may, or may not, give a name, will ask for me in a few moments. He will say he called by appointment. Take him at once to my smoking room, and I will see him there. I am going to Mrs. Warden's room now."

Warden controlled his nervousness before entering his wife's room. She talked with him casually for a moment or so before she even sent away her maid. When they were alone, she suddenly saw that he had come to her to discuss some serious subject.

"Cora," he said, when he had closed the door after the maid, "I want your advice on a business question."

"A business question!" She was greatly surprised. He was one of those men who believe all business matters should be kept from their wives.

"I mean it came to me through some business—discoveries."

"And you cannot decide it for yourself?"

"I had decided it." He looked again at his watch. "I had quite decided it; but now— It may lead to some result which I have suddenly felt that I haven't the right to decide entirely for myself."

Warden's wife for the first time felt alarmed.

"You mean it affects me directly?"

He seized both her hands in his and held her before him.

"Cora," he said, "what would you have me do if you knew I had found out that a young man—a man who, four or five years ago, had as much to live for as any man might—had been outraged in every right by men who are my friends? Would you have me fight the outfit for him? Or would you have me—lie down?"

She stared at him with only pride then; she was proud of his strength, of his ability to fight, of the power she knew he possessed to force his way against opposition. "Why, you would fight them!"

"You want me to fight them?"

"Of course."

"No matter what it costs?"

She realized then that what he was facing was very grave.

"Cora," he said, "I didn't come to ask your advice without putting this squarely to you. If I go into this fight, I shall be not only an opponent to some of my present friends; I shall be a threat to them—something they may think it necessary to remove."

She cried out, "You mean someone might kill you?"

"Should that keep me from going in?"

She hesitated. He went on: "Would you have me afraid to do a thing that ought to be done, Cora?"

"No," she said; "I would not."

"All right, then. That's all I had to know now. The young man is coming to see me tonight, Cora. Probably he's downstairs. I'll tell you all I can after I've talked with him."

He went directly downstairs; as he passed through the hall, the telephone bell rang. Warden himself answered it. Kondo overheard Warden's end of the conversation. Apparently the other person wished to see Warden at once. Warden finished, "All right; I'll come and get you. Wait for me there." Then he hung up.

Turning to Kondo, he ordered his car. Kondo transmitted the order and brought Warden's coat and cap; then Kondo opened the house door for him and the door of the limousine, which had been brought under the porte-cochere. The chauffeur was Patrick Corboy, a young Irishman who had been in Warden's employ for more than five years; his faithfulness to Warden was never questioned. Corboy drove to the place Warden had directed. As they stopped, a young man of less than medium height, broad-shouldered, and wearing a mackintosh, came to the curb and spoke to Warden. Corboy did not hear the name, but Warden immediately asked the man into the car; he directed Corboy to return home. The chauffeur did this, but was obliged on the way to come to a complete stop several times, as he met street-cars or other vehicles on intersecting streets.

Almost immediately after Warden had left the house, the doorbell rang and Kondo answered it. A young man with a quiet and pleasant bearing inquired for Mr. Warden and said he came by appointment. Kondo ushered him into the smoking room, where the stranger waited. In about forty minutes, Corboy drove the car under the porte-cochere again and got down and opened the door. There was no motion inside the limousine. The chauffeur looked in and saw Mr. Warden lying back quietly against the cushions in the back of the seat; he was alone.

Corboy noticed that the curtains all about had been pulled down; he touched the button and turned on the light at the top of the car, and then he saw that Warden was dead; his cap was off, and the top of his head had been smashed by a heavy blow.

The chauffeur drew back, gasping; Kondo, behind him on the steps, cried out and ran into the house calling for help. Two other servants and Mrs. Warden, who had remained nervously in her room, ran down. The stranger who had been waiting, now seen for the first time by Mrs. Warden, came out from the smoking room to help them. He aided in taking the body from the car and helped to carry it into the living room and lay it on a couch; he remained until it was certain that Warden had been killed and nothing could be done. When this had been established and further confirmed by the doctor who was called, Kondo and Mrs. Warden looked around for the young man—but he was no longer there.

The news of the murder brought extras out upon the streets of Seattle, Tacoma and Portland at ten o'clock that night. Seattle, stirred at once at the murder of one of its most prominent citizens, stirred still further at the new proof that Warden had been a power in business and finance; then, as the second day's dispatches from the larger cities came in, it stirred a third time at the realization—for so men said—that this was the second time such a murder had happened.

Warden had been what was called among men of business and finance a member of the "Latron crowd"; he had been close, at one time, to the great western capitalist Matthew Latron; the properties in which he had made his wealth, and whose direction and administration had brought him the respect and attention of other men, had been closely allied with or even included among those known as the "Latron properties"; and Latron, five years before, had been murdered. Latron's murderer had been a man who called upon him by appointment, and Warden's murderer, it appeared, had been equally known to him, or at least equally recommended. Of this as much was made as possible in the suggestion that the same agency was behind the two.

The statements of Kondo and Corboy were verified; it was even learned at what spot Warden's murderer had left the motor unobserved by Corboy. Beyond this, no trace was found of him, and the disappearance of the young man who had come to Warden's house and waited there for three quarters of an hour to see him was also complete.

CHAPTER II

The Express Is Held for a Personage.

Bob Connery, special conductor for the Coast division of one of the chief transcontinentals, was having late breakfast on his day off at his little cottage on the shore of Puget sound, when he was treated to the unusual sight of a large car stopping before his door. The chauffeur hurried from the car to the house with an envelope in his hand. Connery, meeting him at the door, opened the envelope and found within an order in the handwriting of the president of the railroad and over his signature.

"Connery:

"No. 5 being held at Seattle terminal until nine o'clock—will run one hour late. This is your authority to supersede the regular man as conductor—prepared to go through to Chicago. You will facilitate every desire and obey, when possible, any request even as to running of the train, which may be made by a passenger who will identify himself by a card from me.

"H. R. JARVIS."

The conductor, accustomed to take charge of trains when princes, envoys, Presidents and great people of any sort took to travel publicly or privately, fingered the heavy cream-colored notepaper upon which the order was written and looked up at the chauffeur.

The order was surprising enough even to Connery. Some passenger of extraordinary influence, obviously, was to take the train; not only the holding of the transcontinental for an hour told this, but there was the further plain statement that the passenger would be incognito. Astonishing also was the fact that the order was written upon private note-paper. There had been a monogram at the top of the sheet, but it had been torn off; that would not have been if Mr. Jarvis had sent the order from home. Who could have had the president of the road call upon him at half past seven in the morning and have told Mr. Jarvis to hold the Express for an hour?

Connery was certain of the distinctive characters of the president's handwriting. The enigma of the order, however, had piqued him so that he pretended doubt.

"Where did you get this?" he challenged the chauffeur.

"From Mr. Jarvis."

"Of course; but where?"

"You mean you want to know where he was?"

Connery smiled quietly. If he himself was trusted to be cautious and circumspect, the chauffeur also plainly was accustomed to be in the employ of one who required reticence. Connery looked from the note to the bearer more keenly. There was something familiar in the chauffeur's face—just enough to have made Connery believe, at first, that probably he had seen the man meeting some passenger at the station.

"You are—" Connery ventured casually.

"In private employ; yes, sir," the man cut off quickly. Then Connery knew him; it was when Gabriel Warden traveled on Connery's train that the conductor had seen this chauffeur; this was Patrick Corboy, who had driven Warden the night he was killed. But Connery, having won his point, knew better than to show it. "Waiting for a receipt from me?" he asked as if he had abandoned his curiosity.

The chauffeur nodded. Connery took a sheet of paper, wrote on it, sealed it in an envelope and handed it over; the chauffeur hastened back to his car and drove off. Connery whistled softly to himself. Evidently his passenger was to be one of the great men in eastern finance who had been brought west by Warden's death. As the car disappeared, Connery gazed off to the sound.

The March morning was windy and wet, with a storm blowing in from the Pacific. From Elliot bay reverberated the roar of the steam-whistle of some large ship signaling its intention to pass another to the left. The incoming vessel loomed in sight and showed the graceful lines, the single funnel and the white and red-barred flag of the Japanese line, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. Connery saw that it was, as he anticipated, the Tamba Maru, due two days before, having been delayed by bad weather over the Pacific. It would dock, Connery estimated, just in time to permit a passenger to catch the Eastern Express if that were held till nine o'clock. So, as he hastened to the car line, Connery smiled at himself for taking the trouble to make his earlier surmises.

Old Sammy Seaton, the gateman, stood in his iron coop twirling a punch about his finger. Old Sammy's scheme of sudden wealth—everyone has a plan by which at any moment wealth may arrive—was to recognize and apprehend some wrongdoer, or some lost or kidnaped person for whom a great reward would be given. His position at the gate through which must pass most of the people arriving at the great Coast city, or wishing to depart from it, certainly was excellent; and by constant and careful reading of the papers, classifying and memorizing faces, he prepared himself to take advantage of any opportunity. Sammy still awaited his great "strike."

"Any one off on Number Five, Sammy?" Connery questioned carelessly as he approached.

A couple of station-boys, overloaded with hand-baggage, scurried in from the street; someone shouted for a trunk-truck, and baggagemen ran. A group of people, who evidently had come to the station in covered cars, crowded out to the gate and lined up to pass old Sammy. The gateman straightened importantly and scrutinized each person presenting a ticket. Connery inspected with attention the file at the gate and watched old Sammy also as each passed him.

The first in line was a girl—a girl about twenty-two or three, Connery guessed. She had the easy, interested air of a person of assured position. When Connery first saw her, she seemed to be accompanying the man who now was behind her; but she offered her own ticket for perusal at the gate, and as soon as she was through, she hurried on ahead alone.

Connery was certain he did not know her. He noticed that old Sammy had held her at the gate as long as possible, as if hoping to recollect who she might be; but now that she was gone, the gateman gave his attention more closely to the first man—a tall, strongly built man, neither heavy nor light, and with a powerful, patrician face. His eyes were hidden by smoked glasses such as one wears against a glare of snow.

Connery found his gaze following this man; the conductor did not know him, nor had old Sammy recognized him; but both were trying to place him. He, unquestionably, was a man to be known, though not more so than many who traveled in the transcontinental trains.

A trim, self-assured man of thirty—his open overcoat showed a cutaway underneath—came past next, proffering the plain Seattle-Chicago ticket.

An Englishman, with red-veined cheeks, fumbling, clumsy fingers and curious, interested eyes, immediately followed.

The remaining man, carrying his own grips, set them down in the gate and felt in his pocket for his transportation.

This person had appeared suddenly after the line of four had formed in front of old Sammy at the gate; he had taken his place with them only after scrutiny of them. His ticket was a strip which originally had held coupons for the Pacific voyage and some indefinite journey in Asia before; unlike the Englishman's—and his baggage did not bear the pasters of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha—the ticket was close to the date when it would have expired. It bore upon the line where the purchaser signed, the name "Philip D. Eaton" in plain, vigorous characters without shading or flourish.

As a sudden eddy of the gale about the shed blew the ticket from old Sammy's cold fingers, the young man stooped to recover it. The wind blew off his cloth cap as he did so, and as he bent and straightened before old Sammy, the old man suddenly gasped; and while the traveler pulled on his cap, recovered his ticket and hurried down the platform to the train, the gateman stood staring after him as though trying to recall who the man presenting himself as Philip D. Eaton was.

Connery stepped beside the old man.

"Who is it, Sammy?" he demanded.

"Who?" Sammy repeated. His eyes were still fixed on the retreating figure. "Who? I don't know."

The gateman mumbled, repeating to himself the names of the famous, the great, the notorious, in his effort to fit one to the man who had just passed. No one else belated and bound for the Eastern Express was in sight. The president's order to the conductor and to the dispatcher simply had directed that Number Five would run one hour late; it must leave in five minutes; and Connery, guided by the impression the man last through the gate had made upon him and old Sammy both, had no doubt that the man for whom the train had been held was now on board.

Connery went out to the train. The passengers who had been parading the platform had got aboard; the last five to arrive also had disappeared into the Pullmans, and their luggage had been thrown into the baggage car. Connery jumped aboard.

The three who had passed the gate first—the girl, the man with the glasses and the young man in the cutaway—it had now become clear were one party. They had had reservations made, apparently, in the name of Dorne; the girl's address to the spectacled man made plain that he was her father; her name, apparently, was Harriet; the young man in the cutaway coat was "Don" to her and "Avery" to her father. His relation, while intimate enough to permit him to address the girl as "Harry," was unfailingly respectful to Mr. Dorne; and against them both Dorne won his way; his daughter was to occupy the drawing room; he and Avery were to have sections in the open car.

"You have Sections One and Three, sir," the Pullman conductor told him. And Dorne directed the porter to put Avery's luggage in Section One, his own in Section Three.

The Englishman was sent to Section Four in Car Three—the next car forward—and departed at the heels of the porter. Connery watched more closely, as now it came the turn of the young man whose ticket bore the name of Eaton. Eaton had no reservation in the sleepers; he appeared, however, to have some preference as to where he slept.

"Give me a Three, if you have one," he requested of the Pullman conductor. His voice, Connery noted, was well modulated, rather deep, distinctly pleasant. At sound of it, Dorne, who with his daughter's help was settling himself in his section, turned and looked that way and said something in a low tone to the girl. Harriet Dorne also looked, and with her eyes on Eaton, Connery saw her reply inaudibly, rapidly and at some length.

"I can give you Three in Car Three, opposite the gentleman I just assigned," the Pullman conductor offered.

As the porter now took his bags, Eaton followed him out of the car. Connery went after them into the next car. He expected, rather, that Eaton would at once identify himself to him as the passenger to whom President Jarvis' short note had referred. Eaton, however, paid no attention to him, but was busy taking off his coat and settling himself in his section as Connery passed.

The conductor, willing that Eaton should choose his own time for identifying himself, passed slowly on, looking over the passengers as he went. He stood for a few moments in conversation with the dining-car conductor; then he retraced his way through the train. He again passed Eaton, slowing so that the young man could speak to him if he wished, and even halting an instant to exchange a word with the Englishman; but Eaton allowed him to pass on without speaking to him. Connery's step quickened as he entered the next car on his way back to the smoking compartment of the observation car, where he expected to compare sheets with the Pullman conductor before taking up the tickets. As he entered this car, however, Avery stopped him.

"Give Me a Three, If You Have One," He Requested of the Pullman Conductor.

"Mr. Dorne would like to speak to you," Avery said.

Connery stopped beside the section, where the man with the spectacles sat with his daughter. Dorne looked up at him.

"You are the train conductor?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," Connery replied.

Dorne fumbled in his inner pocket and brought out a card-case, which he opened, and produced a card. Connery, glancing at the card while the other still held it, saw that it was President Jarvis' visiting card, with the president's name in engraved block letters; across its top was written briefly in Jarvis' familiar hand, "This is the passenger"; and below, it was signed with the same scrawl of initials which had been on the note Connery had received that morning—"H. R. J."

Connery's hand shook as, while trying to recover himself, he took the card and looked at it more closely, and he felt within him the sinking sensation which follows an escape from danger. He saw that his too ready and too assured assumption that Eaton was the man to whom Jarvis' note had referred, had almost led him into the sort of mistake which is unpardonable in a "trusted" man; he had come within an ace, he realized, of speaking to Eaton and so betraying the presence on the train of a traveler whose journey his superiors were trying to keep secret.

"You need, of course, hold the train no longer," Dorne said to Connery.

"Yes, sir; I received word from Mr. Jarvis about you, Mr. Dorne. I shall follow his instructions fully."

As he went forward again after the train was under way, Connery tried to recollect how it was that he had been led into such a mistake, and defending himself, he laid it all to old Sammy. But old Sammy was not often mistaken in his identifications. If Eaton was not the person for whom the train was held, might he be someone else of importance? Now as he studied Eaton, he could not imagine what had made him accept this passenger as a person of great position. It was only when he passed Eaton a third time, half an hour later, when the train had long left Seattle, that the half-shaped hazards and guesses about the passenger suddenly sprang into form. Allowing for a change of clothes and a different way of brushing his hair, Eaton was exactly the man whom Warden had expected at his house and who had come there and waited while Warden, away in his car, was killed.

Connery was walking back through the train, absent-minded in trying to decide whether he could be at all sure of this; and trying to decide what he should do if he felt sure, when Mr. Dorne stopped him.

"Conductor, do you happen to know," he questioned, "who the young man is who took Section Three in the car forward?"

Connery gasped; but the question put to him the impossibility of his being sure of any recognition from the description. "He gave his name on his ticket as Philip D. Eaton, sir," Connery replied.

"Is that all you know about him?"

"Yes, sir."

"If you find out anything about him, let me know," Dorne bade.

"Yes, sir." Connery determined to let nothing interfere with learning more of Eaton; Dorne's request only gave him added responsibility.

Dorne, however, was not depending upon Connery alone for further information. As soon as the conductor had gone, he turned back to his daughter and Avery upon the seat opposite.

"Avery," he said in a tone of direction, "I wish you to get in conversation with this Philip Eaton. It will probably be useful if you let Harriet talk with him too. She would get impressions helpful to me which you can't."

The girl started with surprise but recovered at once. "Yes, Father," she said.

"What, sir?" Avery ventured to protest.

CHAPTER III

Miss Dorne Meets Eaton.

Dorne motioned Avery to the aisle, where already some of the passengers, having settled their belongings in their sections, were beginning to wander through the cars seeking acquaintances or players to make up a card game. Eaton took from a bag a handful of cigars with which he filled a plain, uninitialed cigar case, and went toward the club and observation car in the rear. As he passed through the sleeper next to him—the last one—Harriet Dorne glanced up at him and spoke to her father; Dorne nodded but did not look up.

The observation room was nearly empty. The only occupants were a young woman who was reading a magazine, and an elderly man. Eaton chose a seat as far from these two as possible.

He had been there only a few minutes, however, when, looking up, he saw Harriet Dorne and Avery enter the room. They passed him, engaged in conversation, and stood by the rear door looking out into the storm. It was evident to Eaton, although he did not watch them, that they were arguing something; the girl seemed insistent, Avery irritated and unwilling. Her manner showed that she won her point finally. She seated herself in one of the chairs, and Avery left her. He wandered, as if aimlessly, to the reading table, turning over the magazines there; abandoning them, he gazed about as if bored; then, with a wholly casual manner, he came toward Eaton and took the seat beside him.

"Rotten weather, isn't it?" Avery observed somewhat ungraciously.

"We're running into it, apparently." Again Avery looked toward Eaton and waited.

"Yes—lucky if we get through."

The conversation on Avery's part was patently forced; and it was equally forced on Eaton's; nevertheless it continued. Avery introduced the war and other subjects upon which men, thrown together for a time, are accustomed to exchange opinions. But Avery did not do it easily or naturally; he plainly was of the caste whose pose it is to repel, not seek, overtures toward a chance acquaintance. His lack of practice was perfectly obvious when at last he asked directly: "Beg pardon, but I don't think I know your name."

IT WILL LIKELY MAKE NO DIFFERENCE TO YOU IN A HUNDRED YEARS FROM NOW

This has been one of the hard weeks to get out the Summit. But doubtless you are inclined to believe that the statement is "far fetched" However, its a fact, and as a matter of fact there are not many weeks when it is easy, even though you want to take it easy. Have you ever thought what it takes to get out even a weekly newspaper? And its harder to get out a weekly than a daily. There are many reasons for this difference. It would take too long to tell you why, and besides you would never understand it, even if we did try. Its going to be hard enough to make the reader believe that there is any hard work connected with the getting out of a weekly newspaper. Then doubtless, after you had read a column or two on what hard work it was, you would not believe it.

There are four of us here in this office who work nine hours a day for six days, and maybe some more But what in the world could four people do to put in the time getting out a paper once a week? Well, one reason for all this is that there are few outside helps. People imagine that all you have to do is to "just put it in." There are forty-eight columns in the Summit every week. If its reading matter, then there are four thousand letters to the column—that makes 172,000. This matter must be obtained from the very air, so to speak. If it takes one four minutes to get a three line item, how long would it take to fill a weekly newspaper? If you have a party at your house; If you have a death in the family; if you celebrate you golden wedding it takes someone's time to "wheedle" the facts out of those who know them even if the reporter just accidently happens to hear a rumor of the item.

You may not think you have an obligation to the community in the way of helping furnish the newspaper with the item and the facts but never-the-less you do. You may not believe that the community is particularly interested in you and your affairs, but you are mistaken. This may be a selfish old world but never-the-less there are hundreds of people who are interested in news items concerning you—even though you are not of the "prominent" people. Every one of you are helping make the history of your community, your county, your state and your country. You should do your part to have your share properly recorded. It will likely make no difference to you in a hundred years but it might to someone else—and surely you are not so selfish as "not to care." What you should do, regardless of who you are of your station in life, it to see that items concerning yourself and friends are given to the newspapers and that the correct information is given. If there is a birth, wedding or death among your friends, give the information to the newspaper—that it may be correct. If you or your friends have an accident, see that the proper manner of how it happened is given the Summit; if—a hundred things that go to make up the history of our community come to your knowledge, give us the facts, or information that will lead to our obtaining them.

We want the news with which to fill these columns, but we do not want it any worse than you do. In fact you want it more than the editor or reporter does. You want it so that you may know what is going on in your community that you may sit down in a comfortable chair and digest the contents of a well filled paper—while the editor wants it so it will make more work for him.—Forest City Summit.

VOL. 4 | BELMOND, IOWA, THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1923 | NO. 8

BELMOND SHORT COURSE ON JANUARY 23-24

Sugar Co. Is Now Contracting Acreage

Field Agents To Start On 1923 Acreage Within Few Days And Prospects Good.

TO USE 50-50 CONTRACT

The Iowa Valley Operating Co. is now ready to begin contracting beet acreage for the 1923 season, and it is expected that within the next few days a full force of fieldmen will be on the job soliciting acreage.

It is probable that the same contract used in 1922 will be used this year, the "fifty-fifty" proposition. This contract is the best and fairest so far evolved, and gave universal satisfaction both to growers and company. It is probably that the 1923 acreage will be much greater than in 1922. Many farmers who have not heretofore grown beets have expressed themselves as intending to raise some this year. Those who had crops last year realized good money, one man near Rowan clearing close to $1,200 after all expenses from 29 acres.

All indications now point to a bigger year for both beet growers and sugar company in 1923. Belmond is vitally interested in the beet industry and all will boost for a bigger year.

BIG HOG CASE SETTLED

The case of Severe and Sams the noted hog case on trial in district court, was decided in favor of Severe last week. The case has attracted considerable attention in the county owing to the prominence of the parties and the amount of money involved, about $200,000, and the case has been bitterly contested by both sides. U. H. Rummel was appointed Receiver with bond at $30,000.

EAGLE GROVE POKER PLAYERS NABBED AT BELMOND.

The Belmond Independent is authority for the statement that three Eagle Grove poker players were nabbed there last week, and thrown into what was called Hotel Lang—the city bastile. About the same time two Clarion boot-leggers were also gathered in and thrown in with the Eagle Grovers, and that swelled the population of the "quay" to twelve, while its capacity is supposed to be only eight. Close quarters.

Just how the Humboldt Republican gets the above, the Independent is unable to figure, unless the Republican editor got the Clarion papers and the Independent mixed, in his clippings. Belmond poker players will probably be nabbed first before Eagle Grove is started on, if it comes to that.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

There was a good attendance at all the services last Sunday. The junior Christian Endeavor started off with a good attendance and much interest. All boys and girls from five to thirteen are invited to join.

We just lacked an average of one and one-half of reaching our mark for our Sunday school attendance last year. We have set our mark a little higher this year and we believe that we will be able to reach it. Be on hand at 10:00 a. m. next Sunday and come prepared to stay for the 11:00 o'clock service also.

Jr. C. E. at 2:30 p. m. and the evening services of praise and worship at 7:30. We are having some great evening services and those who attend are enjoying them. Our orchestra is getting better all the time and is a great help in the music.

The Ladies Aid Society will hold their first meeting of the year Thursday afternoon at 2:30. All are urged to be present.

McNICALL BUYS HALL

John McNicall of Garner, is one of the new proprietors of the Garner Billiard Parlors, thru a deal recently completed at that place. John, who formerly resided in Belmond when he was employed with the sugar factory, and another Garner citizen bought the parlors. McNicall has resigned his position as City Marshall of Garner to enter his new business. As marshall he made a fine record for enforcing the laws and keeping the town rid of drunks and crooks.

FOREST CITY YOUTH SHOT

A young Forest City youth, Gesle Hanna, was accidently shot and killed last week, while hunting rabbits. Hanna had shot a rabbit and wounded that it could not run fast, and young Hanna ran it down. Rather than waste another shell on the animal, he attempted to finish it by clubbing it with the butt of his double-barreled shotgun. As he struck it, the other barrel was discharged, the full load of shot penetrating his abdomen, injuring him so that he died immediately.

SHERIFF ROBB AT EAGLE

The Times of Eagle Grove says that the Legion Post of that city s endeavoring to secure Sheriff Robb, of Des Moines, to give an address in that town in the near future. Sheriff Robb is planning a lecture tour of the country, and the post hopes to have him come to Eagle Grove. A committee has been appointed to take care of the matter and to arrange for a date sometime in January or February. Sheriff Robb has become almost a noted character for the way he handled things at the Capital City during his regime, and should the Eagle Grove Legion be successful in seuring him for an address, they would doubtless draw largely from all over the county.

LEGION MEETS

The members of the Eimbrink Post of the American Legion met at the Legion hall last week Thursday evening to make out their bonus applications. Between 75 and 100 of the boys were present, and some half a dozen of the typing experts of the bunch were kept pounding away most of the evening filling out applications. After the work was over they all enjoyed a good feed and social time.

DISTRICT COURT SEEMS A LITTLE BIT DULL

Cases Lining Up For February Term Not As Plentiful As The Last Term.

Monitor.—The Waterloo Auto Co. has begun suit against M. O. Crawford to recover the sum of $209.75 on his promissory note, secured by chattel mortgage on a Mitchell one ton truck.

On Christmas Day Mrs. Josephine Moon of Eagle Grove alleges that her husband violently kicked her and on the day previous violently assaulted her and threw her over a table; that as a result she was compelled to call a doctor and was in bed for two days; wherefore plaintiff demands a divorce from the bonds of matrimony.

George W. Young asks jugment against Clarence McBride in the sum of $192.54 on his promissory note and the foreclosure of a lien upon nine shares of elevator stock.

Hans Berkland and Fred Littell are named defendants in a suit of the Wisconsin Lumber Co. to collect $38.96.

Standard Oil Co. vs. Geo. Whirling is a suit to collect $70.60 on account.

Bovee Furnace Works of Waterloo asks judgment against Sarah Johnson of Eagle Grove for $259.37, amount alleged to be due on a furnace installed in her home.

A peculiar suit on a note is that of J. W. McNamara of Belmond vs. Otto Madison. Fourteen years ago defendant gave plaintiff his note for $125. Nine and one-half years later he renewed the same including interest to that date, totaling $225. That was four and one-half years ago. The note has since been misplaced, but plaintiff thinks a judgment for $300 would satisfy his claim.

Emma E. Roblin administratrix of the estate of E. R. Roblin, brings suit against C. Claude, Harry Claude and Will Downing to collect on their primissory note the sum of $322.94.

Licenses to wed were issued this week by the clerk to the following couples: Orval Malin Joseph and Esther Amelia Thomson of Goldfield; Charles August Hilpipre and Alma Sophia Edwards of Clarion; Frank Pyle of Chares City and Mae E. Tolle of Bassett; Harry Peterson of Badger and Julia Mandsager of Eagle Grove; Thomas Djiewanoski and Garnet Bamford; Din J. Merritt of Griswold and Mabel O. Gunderson; Eldon H. Sumners and Elsie M. Banks of Clarion; William M. Larson and Judith Varo.

KILLS WOMAN BY AUTO

Friends in Belmond of Casper Telcamp will be sorry to learn of a serious auto accident wherein Telcamp ran over and killed a woman at his present home, Ladysmith, Wisconsin. Telcamp, who lived around here for several years, working on different farms east of town moved to Ladysmith where he managed a hotel. Last Thursday afternoon while driving his car, he ran into a Mrs. Edgar Baker. Mrs. Baker was at the foot of a big hill west of the City, walking along the road, a doctor stopped to give her a ride. As she was getting into the doctor's car, Telcamp came along at a high speed, and turning out on the wrong side of the road, struck Mrs. Baker. His car dragged her about 50 feet and then went over a 10 foot bank, the car passing over her. A husband and four children are left. Telcamp was arrested and lodged in jail to await the verdict of the coroner's jury. The woman's back, jaw and left leg were broken one hip dislocated and the body badly bruised. She died immediately.

ST. OLAF

Next Sunday morning the service will be conducted in the Norwegian language. We want to see a large attendance. The services begin at 11 o'clock. Come and take someone with you. FRANK JOHNSON DIES ON HIS WAY HOME

After Lingering Illness Belmond Young Man Passes Away On Train At Carroll.

Belmond people were much grieved last week when they received the news of the death of Frank Johnson one of this city's best known young men.

For the past year or two, Frank had been in Colorado receiving treatment for tuberculosis. It was known that he was very ill, but his death came as a surprise to many. His father J. N. Johnson had gone to Colorado a short time ago to bring him home, after it was found that a cure was impossible. Frank and his father had nearly reached home when near Carroll, Iowa, Frank quietly passed away on the train.

John Franklin Johnson was born in Belmond, Iowa, May 13, 1892, and died near Carroll, Iowa, January 4, 1923, death being due to tuberculosis. He lived his entire life in Belmond with the exception of the time he was in the service of his country during the world war. He was a graduate of the Belmond high school in 1912, and after completing his duties there, was engaged with his father in lookng after the various interests of their farms and business. On July 29, 1918, he entered the army, going first to Camp Forest, Georgia, and assigned to Co. B, 211ts Reg. Engineers. His division was ordered later to Camp Meade, Maryland. He was honorably discharged on February 6, 1919.

He leaves besides his parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Johnson, three sisters, Mrs. G. R Hill of Clarion, Mrs. Thayne Bailey of Belmond and Marie besides other relatives and a host of friends.

Funeral services were held Saturday January 6 at 9:30 a. m. at the St. Francis church, Rev Father Eardley in charge, and the Eimbrink Post of the American Legion giving the military part of the services. Interment was in St. Francis cemetery.

HIGH SCHOOL NOTES

School opened after vacation with all the teachers on the job and every one glad to be back.

Friday night at 7:15 our basket ball teams will play the Garner girls and boys. These games will be close and every one should be out to see them.

Saturday comes the third and last number of our Lecture Course. The Coran-Welsh singers are an excellent company and it will pay you to hear them.

Next week come the semester examinations. Everyone is busy with reviews.

The Normal Training students will write the State examination next week.

LAST LECTURE NUMBER SAT.

The last number of the lecture course for this winter will be held this week Saturday evening, January 13, at the high school auditorium. The Cavan Welsh Singer are the artists, and they have a very strong program which is highly recommended by those who have heard it.

The lecture course this winter has been under the auspices of the high school of Belmond and it has not been financially a success. The backers of the course stand to lose a goodly sum on the course as matters are at present, unless the receipts of this last number are sufficient to make up a large share of the deficit, the chances are that Belmond will not have a lecture course next winter. It is to be hoped that this will not be the case, and that the attendance next Saturday evening will be such as to warrant a continuance of the course. Be at the auditorium Saturday night, hear a program well worth your money, and help to keep this high class of entertainment in Belmond.

MOTHER DIES

Mrs. Ella Sands of Belmond received word of the death of her mother, Mrs. M. J Perinton, at Dows. Deceased was born in New York state February 16, 1840, and died at Dows on New Year's morning. Funeral services were held at Popejoy. Besides Mrs. Sands, the aged husband, one son, and four daughters are left to mourn her passing.

3400 Auto Licenses

The county treasurer's office reports that up to this date approximately 3400 auto licenses have been issued in Wright County for the year 1923. Some 800 are still on the delinquent list. These figures show a rather astonishing number of cars and trucks in this county. Very few kicks have been registered on the licenses fees.

Ford

THE UNIVERSAL CAR

INTERESTING FACTS

106,327 Ford Cars and Trucks Retailed In November

Approximately the same number was scheduled for delivery in December

WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?

This volume of deliveries to actual owners is entirely unprecedented for this time of the year.

It has taxed the manufacturing ability of the Ford plants working at full capacity.

It indicates a volume of business during the rapidly approaching months of "heavy demand" which will be far beyond the maximum production schedule which the Ford Motor Company has set--

And that means that a Ford shortage even more acute than the one which existed last Spring and Summer.

Dealers stocks all over the country are low---there are no reserves to draw upon to meet the demands for delivery---

There is no way in which dealer reserves can be built up, as deliveries have been made to customers as fast as Cars could be manufactured since last April.

The only way you can protect your desire to obtain prompt delivery of a Ford even at this time is to place your order immediately.

This emphasizes more strongly than anything we could possibly say the necessity of your making prompt arrangements with a Ford Dealer for the listing of your order, particularly if you are contemplating the purchase of a Ford Car or Truck for use this Spring or Summer.

We believe you are entitled to know these facts as they actually exist.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Annual Meeting Great Success

The annual meeting of the Wright County Farm Bureau which was held in the court room at Clarion last Wednesday, January 3rd was attended by over four hundred people from various parts of the county. This annual affair seems to be growing in attendance and general interest.

The forenoon session was spent in listening to an address by President Harry Summers and report by secretary E. W. Campbell and treasurer E. A. Patton, also the report of the auditing committee of which Geo. C. Kirstein was chairman..

The afternoon session was opened by several selection by Meeker's orchestra followed by the county agent's annual report. A mixed quartette selection was then given by Mrs. C. O. Fitts, Miss Maude Newgard, A. E. Chamberlain, all of Belmond, and the county agent. This was followed by an address by J. F. Coupe, assistant secretary of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation at Des Moines. According to Mr. Coupe there are five main issues before the farmers today. They are Marketing, Transportation, Legislation, Finances and Credits. He opened his interesting speech by referring to historical facts to show that farmers as a class have always been unorganized until the last few years, then proceeded to show what a great need there is today for organization among farmers when every other commercial and industrial interest of the country is so completely organized. He spent most of his time in explaining in an interesting and most convincing way the accomplishments of the state and national Farm Bureau Federations of the past year and told briefly the program of work which is to be followed during 1923. Mr. Coupe undoubtedly gave one of the best Farm Bureau addresses which has been given since his appearance at the annual picnic two years ago. The unlimited fund of information at his tongue's end and the earnestness and forcefulness of his expression are the factors which clinched his points in the minds of his listeners. Mr. Coupe left no doubt in anyone's mind but what the farm Bureau is an organization which has served, either directly or indirectly, every farmer in the state of Iowa, many times the amount of the membership fee.

Following the address by Mr. Coupe was the report of the nomination committee, W. F. Mechem-chairman, which placed the following men in nomination:

J. E. Kirstein, Woolstock and Geo. A. Miller, Vernon, president.

A. E. Martin, Belmond and O. J. Pardun, Lincoln, vice president.

M. L. Clark, Belmond and Harry Inners, Liberty, secretary.

E. A. Patton, Blaine and Chas. M. Overbaugh, Lincoln, treasurer.

The final vote gave the following results:

J. E. Kirstein, president.

O. J. Pardun, vice president.

M. L. Clark, secretary.

E. A. Patton, treasurer.

The directors representing the township were then officially voted into the County Farm Bureau directorate. They are as follows:

Boone—W. H. Eastman.
Norway—Harold Holm.
Liberty—Harry Inners.
Lake—Clarence McBride.
Pleasant—J. F. Henn.
Iowa—Lyle Hall.
Grant—Alfred Huntley.
Vernon—H. A. Flett.
Blaine—T. P. Simpson.
Lincoln—L. W. Collins.
Wall Lake—R. E. Molsher.
Troy—J. E. Thebiay.
Eagle Grove—O. A. Stryker.
Wolstock—Matt Adams.
Dayton—Harry Poundstone.

The election of officers was followed by the reading and adoption of the resolutions as follows:

1. Resolved that the Wright county Farm Bureau believes that the so-called "Corn Belt States" should have a closer bond of union that is possible in the National Federation.

Therefore be it resolved that the Wright county Farm Bureau request the State Federation of Iowa to take up with the other "Corn Belt" states the question of closer cooperation.

Resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to the State Farm Bureau secretary, to be presented to the Annual Convention.

2 Resolved that the Wright county Farm Bureau condemn the bill before Congress known as the "Ship Subsidy Bill" as class legislation.

Resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to our National Senators and Representatives.

3 Resolved that we indorse the American and State Federations in their activities along the lines of solving our marketing problems, and recommend that they continue this important work.

4. Resolved that the State Federation take up the problems of marketing of the Dairy and Poultry products and that they make a thorough investigation of the marketing of these products to determine the best practical way of marketing the same.

Be it further resolved that a copy of this resolution be put before the State Federation convention.

5. Resolved that the Wright county Farm Bureau commend our County Agent, R. M. Edwards, for his real and his efficiency in his work as County Agent, and especially for his work with the boys and girls.

County Poultry Association Formed

A meeting was held at the county agent's office last Tuesday evening when about twenty-five poultry breeders of Wright county met for the purpose of organizing a County Poultry association.

The county agent was elected temporary chairman of the meeting and W. F. Fleming temporary secretary. Problems of interest to the poultry breeders of the county were discussed and plans made for the work of the association for the coming year. The sentiment of those present seemed to be in favor of having an annual poultry show held under the auspices of the Wright County Poultry association. There seems to be sufficient interest in poultry breeding to warrant a county-wide association and a county-wide show each year.

The Rowan poultry show which is to be held in connection with their short course January 16-17 was discussed freely and it was decided that the county association should cooperate with the Rowan people in putting on their poultry show. We understand the Rowan poultry exhibit is open to the world.

Lincoln Social Meeting

The Lincoln township Center school house was packed to overflowing last Friday evening when the first meeting of 1923 of the Lincoln Farm Bureau was held The attendance at this meeting would indicate that farmers of Lincoln township farm bureau are starting the new year with plenty of enthusiasm.

L. W. Collins, the newly elected township director, presided and gave a short talk which was followed by a few words from the county agent. Ross Mechem told in an interesting way his experiences on his trip to the International Live Stock Show at Chicago. He told of the many places of interest which were visited by the eight hundred boys and girls, members of the various clubs from the different parts of the United States, and read a personal letter from the president of one of the commercial organizations in Chicago whose plant was visited by the boys and girls expressing his appreciation of their visit and wishing success in the future development of the club work.

Rev. H. L. Lewis of the Church of Christ gave an inspirational address at this meeting and entertained the Lincoln people for about an hour and a half with his interesting address. Mr. Lewis gave an address which was not only interesting but which was practical and the people of that community are agreed that even though he was asked to speak on a subject out of his field of activity, he talked on farmers' problems in a way which brought out many good suggestions and at the same time reflected credit upon him as one interested in community progress.

Those in charge of plans for the Rowan short course January 16-17 have decided to hold a junior livestock judging contest which will be open to all boys and girls of Wright and Franklin counties up to and including eighteen years. The judging contest will be in charge of the county agent and will be conducted according to the usual rules of junior judging. Each contestant will be required to judge one class each of horses, cattle, sheep and hogs, also one class of corn and give placings on all classes judged. Each class will consist of four animals and the contestants will be graded on the basis of 100 points for each class judged, making a possible 500 for the boy or girl who places all classes correctly. Work must be absolutely individual and contestants will be disqualified for communication of any kind.

It has been planned to have the Wright county judging team which won at Chicago arrange the classes for the junior judging work and make the placings which will be used in making the awards to the winners. There will be two prizes of $5.00 ad $2.50 for the best judges in this contest. All boys and girls who wish to enter this contest should report to the county agent by 9:00 o'clock Tuesday morning, January 16, at the Rowan judging pavilion.

Chicago Daily Tribune

THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER

Announces

A BIG REDUCTION IN SUBSCRIPTION RATES

For the Benefit of Readers Receiving The Tribune By Mail

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE, realizing that its phenomenal success is due in a large measure to the fact that for seventy-five years it has numbered among its readers a large proportion of the residents of farms and small cities who receive The Tribune by mail, announces for their benefit a big reduction in subscription rates effective January 15th, 1923.

In 1917, as a war measure, Congress passed a bill providing for four annual raises in Postal Rates for newspaper subscriptions. As The Tribune had, for many years before, sold its paper to out-of-town readers at less than cost, it felt compelled to add a portion of these postage increases to its subscription rates.

For the past three years The Chicago Tribune has been leading the fight to obtain a reduction in second-class postage rates so that it could reduce to pre-war prices its subscription rates to residents of farms and small cities.

Although every one of the other ten taxes established by the war revenue act of 1917 has been reduced, Congress has not seen fit as yet to reduce the tax on second-class postage.

At the present Postal Rates it costs The Tribune from $3.20 to $6.79 a year for Postage alone to send the paper to each subscriber in the States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin. In many instances this is more than The Tribune's entire subscription price—without considering the cost of the product.

Many of our farmer friends have stated that it required from 10 to 12 bushels of corn to pay for a year's subscription to The Chicago Daily Tribune. The Tribune is anxious to remedy that fact.

TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF THIS OFFER TEAR OUT COUPON and MAIL AT ONCE!

If you prefer to do so, you may turn subscription coupon below over to your postmaster, publisher, or newsdealer who will forward it to us.

Therefore, without waiting further for Congress to act, The Tribune announces a reduction in subscription rates ranging from ⅓ to ½. This cut in rates will cost The Tribune approximately $200,000.00 each year, but The Tribune will pay the bill in the interest of its many country readers.

New subscriptions to The Chicago Daily Tribune, starting on and after January 15th, 1923, will be accepted at the following rates:

THE CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE
(By Mail, Six Days a Week)

These Rates Apply Only to Subscriptions in States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin. (Cities, Towns and Rural Routes included.)

Period	Old Rate	New Rate
1 Month	$1.00	$ .50
3 Months	2.50	1.25
6 Months	3.75	2.50
12 Months	7.50	5.00

The Chicago Daily Tribune today enjoys the largest circulation in its history and the largest morning circulation in America—averaging over 530,000 copies daily. It will readily be seen, therefore, that the reduction is not made primarily to secure more circulation.

If you wish to receive The Chicago Daily Tribune—with its many wonderful features—regularly, take advantage of these new, low rates now. Mail subscription coupon below. Note that $2.50 will now bring you The Chicago Daily Tribune by mail for six months, or $5.00 for a whole year.

For the benefit of its country readers The Tribune will continue its fight for fairer postage rates.

GAY PARIS IS SHOWN

When "White and Unmarried" of which Thomas Meighan is the star, comes to the Star theatre, Rowan, on next Saturday, Jan. 13, film patrons will have an opportunity of seeing how "the other half lives" in the gay French capital. Meighan appears as a crook who reforms when his uncle leaves him half a million dollars and goes to Europe to kill time.

He has a romance and incidently is involved in some desperate encounters with Apaches in Paris. It is the Paris of the novelists that is shown. The underground Paris—the Paris of the dance halls, the Apaches, the picturesque and hectic. Billy Kane developes into a man of rare prowess and rescues several damsels in distress. SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved.

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

Eaton was obliged to give it.

"Mine's Avery," the other offered; "perhaps you heard it when we were getting our berths assigned."

And again the conversation, enjoyed by neither of them, went on. Finally the girl at the end of the car rose and passed them, as though leaving the car. Avery looked up.

"Where are you going, Harry?"

"I think someone ought to be with Father."

"I'll go in just a minute."

She had halted almost in front of them. Avery, hesitating as though he did not know what he ought to do, finally arose; and as Eaton observed that Avery, having introduced himself, appeared now to consider it his duty to present Eaton to Harriet Dorne, Eaton also arose. Avery murmured the names. Harriet Dorne, resting her hand on the back of Avery's chair, joined in the conversation. As he replied easily and interestedly to a comment of Eaton's, Avery suddenly reminded her of her father. After a minute, when Avery—still ungracious and still irritated over something which Eaton could not guess—rather abruptly left them, she took Avery's seat; and Eaton dropped into his chair beside her.

Now, this whole proceeding—though within the convention which, forbidding a girl to make a man's acquaintance directly, says nothing against her making it through the medium of another man—had been so unnaturally done that Eaton understood that Harriet Dorne deliberately had arranged to make his acquaintance, and that Avery, angry and objecting, had been overruled.

She seemed to Eaton less alertly boyish now than she had looked an hour before when they had boarded the train. Her cheeks were smoothly rounded, her lips rather full, her lashes very long. He could not look up without looking directly at her, for her chair, which had not been moved since Avery left it, was at an angle with his own.

To avoid the appearance of studying her too openly, he turned slightly, so that his gaze went past her to the white turmoil outside the windows.

"It's wonderful," she said, "isn't it?"

"You mean the storm?" A twinkle of amusement came to Eaton's eyes. "It would be more interesting if it allowed a little more to be seen. At present there is nothing visible but snow."

"Is that the only way it affects you? An artist would think of it as a background for contrasts—a thing to sketch or paint; a writer as something to be written down in words."

Eaton understood. She could not more plainly have asked him what he was.

"And an engineer, I suppose," he said, easily, "would think of it only as an element to be included in his formulas—an x, or an a, or a b, to be put in somewhere and square-rooted or squared so that the roof-truss he was figuring should not buckle under its weight."

"Oh—so that is the way you were thinking of it?"

"You mean," Eaton challenged her directly, "am I an engineer?"

"Are you?"

"Oh, no; I was only talking in pure generalities, just as you were."

"Let us go on, then," she said gayly. "I see I can't conceal from you that I am doing you the honor to wonder what you are. A lawyer would think of it in the light of damage it might create and the subsequent possibilities of litigation." She made a little pause. "A business man would take it into account, as he has to take into account all things in nature or human; it would delay transportation, or harm or aid the winter wheat."

"Or stop competition somewhere," he observed, more interested.

The flash of satisfaction which came to her face and as quickly was checked and faded showed him she thought she was on the right track.

"Business," she said, still lightly, "will—how is it the newspapers put it?—will marshal its cohorts; it will send out its generals in command of brigades of snowplows, its colonels in command of regiments of snow shovelers and its spies to discover and to bring back word of the effect upon the crops."

"You talk," he said, "as if business were a war."

"Isn't it?—like war, but war in higher terms."

"In higher terms?" he questioned, attempting to make his tone like hers, but a sudden bitterness now was betrayed by it. "Or in lower?"

"Why, in higher," she declared, "demanding greater courage, greater devotion, greater determination, greater self-sacrifice. Recruiting officers can pick any man off the streets and make a good soldier of him, but no one could be so sure of finding a satisfactory employee in that way. Doesn't that show that daily life, the everyday business of earning a living and bearing one's share in the workaday world, demands greater qualities than war?"

Her face had flushed eagerly as she spoke; a darker, livid flush answered her words on his.

"But the opportunities for evil are greater, too," he asserted almost fiercely. "How many of those men you speak of on the streets have been deliberately, mercilessly, even savagely sacrificed to some business expediency, their future destroyed, their hope killed!" Some storm of passion, whose meaning she could not divine, was sweeping him.

"You mean," she asked after an instant's silence, "that you, Mr. Eaton, have been sacrificed in such a way?"

"I am still talking in generalities," he denied ineffectively.

He saw that she sensed the untruthfulness of these last words. Her smooth young forehead and her eyes were shadowy with thought. Eaton was uneasily silent. Finally Harriet Dorne seemed to have made her decision.

"I think you should meet my father, Mr. Eaton," she said. "Would you like to?"

He did not reply at once. He knew that his delay was causing her to study him now with great surprise.

"I would like to meet him, yes," he said, "but"—he hesitated, tried to avoid answer without offending her, but already he had affronted her—"but not now, Miss Dorne."

She stared at him, rebuffed and chilled.

"You mean—" The sentence, obviously, was one she felt it better not to finish. As though he recognized that now she must wish the conversation to end, he got up. She rose stiffly.

"I'll see you into your car, if you're returning there," he offered.

Neither spoke, as he went with her into the next car; and at the section where her father sat, Eaton bowed silently, nodded to Avery, who coldly returned his nod, and left her. Eaton went on into his own car and sat down, his thoughts in mad confusion.

How near he had come to talking to this girl about himself, even though he had felt from the first that that was what she was trying to make him do! Was he losing his common sense? Was the self-command on which he had so counted that he had dared to take this train deserting him? He felt that he must not see Harriet Dorne again alone. In Avery he had recognized, by that instinct which so strangely divines the personalities one meets, an enemy from the start; Dorne's attitude toward him, of course, was not yet defined; as for Harriet Dorne—he could not tell whether she was prepared to be his enemy or friend.

Eaton went into the men's compart-

BELMOND SHORT COURSE IS HUGE SUCCESS

Fire Tuesday Wipes Out Schooler Home

House Burns To Ground With All Household Goods A Total Loss By Fire.

FIREMEN DO FINE WORK

The fire demon certainly must have it in for the Schooler family, for their third fire since their residence in Belmond, and the fourth in all, completely destroyed their household goods and the house they were occupying early Tuesday morning.

The alarm was sounded about five o'clock, Mr. and Mrs. Thayne Bailey, who live in one of the three sugar company houses on the east side of the road at the factory grounds, were awakened early Tuesday morning by the smell of smoke. A search of the house failed to locate any fire, and they again retired. The odor of smoke became so strong that they became alarmed, and dressing, made another thoro inspection of their house to no avail. Thayne then went outside, where he saw the Schooler house ablaze and immediately turned in the alarm.

The fire company were on the scene almost before the siren ceased, their time being astonishing and bespeaking a world of credit for their efficiency. The fire had made such headway, however, that the house could not be saved and all efforts were devoted to saving the residence occupied by Mr. Saecke and family, which had caught on fire. The chemicals were exhausted, and while the truck was up town getting another load, the boys formed a bucket brigade and carried pails of water from a well nearby, keeping the fire in check until the truck returned, when a shot of chemical under the ridge board put out the blaze.

Mr. and Mrs. Schooler were away, Mrs. Schooler visiting relatives at Woodward, and Bill working in Des Moines. They had not been at home for two weeks, and no fire had been in the house during their absence. The origin of the blaze is a mystery. The house was fully covered by insurance, but it is not known whether Schoolers had their goods insured or not. Everything was a total wreck, not a thing being saved.

TRAMP GETS A NEW CAR

During a trade extension campaign just concluded at Ames a tramp was awarded an automoblie which was given away by the merchants of the town. He was passing through the city the day the sale closed and bought a pair of overalls at one of the stores. He got the car, sold it and bought a railroad ticket to New York City.

A simular experience is recorded at Gilmore City. A traveling man going through the town bought some gasoline at one of the filling stations and gave his merchandise certificate to a little girl standing on the curb nearby. She was awarded the car.

DOWS BEET SUGAR FACTORY NOW CONTRACTING ACREAGE

The beet sugar factory at Dows is now contracting acreage for the coming year. They are using the same contract as last year, and expect to have no difficulty to sign up as much land as they can use.

This company had a very successful year last year, and feels greatly encouraged in their work, and hopes to make a killing next year.

The Humboldt Republican again "pulled a boner" with the above article. Dows has many good things but as yet Belmond's sugar factory hasn't been added to them. Next!

SCHOOL NOTES

Our debating team went to Clarion last Thursday eve while our Affirmative team debated against Clarions team at Belmond. Although we did not win the honors in either debate, we are proud that our debaters made a good showing in both debates.

The boys basket ball team made their fifth victory of this season when they won over Clarion to the tune of 27 to 5. Belmond boy's team has as yet been undefeated and we expect to keep up the good record.

Our girl's team also made a good showing against the Clarion team Friday night. The final score was 23 to 2 in favor of Belmond.

The girls team went to Hampton Saturday and were defeated by a 39 to 8 score.

Both the boy's and girl's teams will go to Garner Friday night. The roads are good. Come and boost for Belmond.

Second semester work started Monday.

LAND OWNERS WANT TO WITHDRAW FROM TOWN

Eagle Grove has been having a fight by land owners adjacent to the city, to withdraw from the school district on account of the taxes and last week's Eagle said in part:

The school board at its Monday night meeting discussed at length the petition of land owners whose farms are included in the Independent school district of Eagle Grove. Said petitioners desire to withdraw from the district and be rejoined to the districts to which they formerly belonged, or to districts nearest them in the country. By so doing they would greatly reduce their school tax. The school tax on these lands is approximately $1.00 per acre. The district is bonded for about $200,000 on account of building and furnishing the new high school building. Should the petition of the farm owners be granted they would be released from the obligation of paying for the bonds already sold and for any other obligations incurred while they were a part of the Independent school district of Eagle Grove. The only way in which they would be required to pay for their proportionate share of the new building tax would be in the event that the present district would go bankrupt.

The change will probably take place if the local school board sanctions it. Should the present school board favor the change, it would be approved by the county superintendent and undoubtedly receive favorable action on the part of the district court. Should the school board not favor releasing the lands in the present school district, the landowners have recourse thru the courts. They have retained Senator Chase of Webster City to represent them and he is of the opinion the landowners have the right to secede if they so desire.

ROWAN MAN THREATENS WIFE

The following clipping is taken from the Dowagiac Mich., Daily News, and concerns a well known Rowan citizen.

R. E. Ryder of Rowan, said to be the husband of an Eau Claire school teacher who has assumed her former name of Miss Gladys Toyne, appeared in Dowagiac today and is charged with threatening his wife and attempting to coerce her into returning to Iowa with him.

Ryder was taken into custody this afternoon by Police Chief W. M. McGowan and it is announced by Attorney James Kinnane that papers will be filed requesting that he be placed under bonds to keep the peace.

It is stated that Miss Toyne plans to divorce her husband and has come to Michigan to establish a residence here to secure her divorce.

HURT IN AUTO WRECK

Hampton Chronicle—C. F. Peterson, of Dows and Mrs. O. B. Bates, of this city, were injured in an automobile accident last Sunday morning when the Peterson family, accompanied by Mrs. Bates, were on their way to Hampton. Mrs. Bates suffered a broken right leg, just above the knee, and was otherwise quite severely bruised, and Mr. Peterson sustained two broken ribs, when the automobile skidded and went into the ditch near the C. F. Manifold farm home on the main road about half way between Hampton and Dows.

Mr. Peterson and Mrs. Bates were riding in the front seat and Mrs. Peterson and her two children, Carl and Evelyn, were riding in the back seat when the accident occurred. The party was on the way from the Peterson home at Dows, where Mrs. Bates had been visiting, to the Bates home in Hampton where a birthday dinner, in honor of the anniversaries of Mrs. Peterson and little Evelyn, was being prepared.

When near the Manifold place the car skidded and turned turtle in the ditch at the side of the road. Mrs. Bates and Mr. Peterson was pinned under the car, but Mrs. Peterson managed to crawl out from under it and secured help from the nearby house.

AUTO LICENSES HIGH

The number of automobiles in Iowa has inceased 900 per cent in the last ten years, and the receipts from automoblie license fees are more than 1,500 per cent higher, according to figures given out by Walter C. Ramsay, secretary of state. In 1912, there were but 47,188 cars in the state and the receipts were only $485,300. The registrations for 1922 are 469,230 automobile and 31,934 trucks, or a total of 501,173 motor vehicles. Up to Nov. 1, the receipts of the motor vehicle department were $7,923,181.21 and 93¼ per cent of this sum or $7,408,174.43 will be expended upon highways of the state. The remainder goes to the support of the highway commission and the motor vehicle department. There are now 10,500 licensed chauffeurs in the state, according to the figures in the motor vehicle department.

SOME INTERESTING DOINGS UP AT COURT

Number Of New Cases Are Filed, Among Them One Or Two From Belmond.

Monitor—Roy Nelson of Eagle Grove is being detained for thirty days at the county jail. He is charged with being the main guy in a hootch party and "gently" rapping Marshal Fisher over the eye with a poker when the officer interferred.

E. M. Callender writes from St. Paul that he is making rapid recovery from the operation on his eye and will soon return to his post of duty at the auditor's office.

The auditor's office has already issued 450 dog licenses. These was something like 1300 canines in the county last year, but it is expected that number will be reduced somewhat when the assessors' returns are in for 1923.

Chairman Grattidge and Supervisor Harris were in session at the court house Tuesday for the purpose of listing the property in the hands of the various county officers. The new law requires that everything be listed from pens and pencils to typewriters and adding machines.

The county clerk issued marriage licenses the past week to Ralph Charles Cox and Selma H. Rief Lewis Francis Stevens and Margaret Jane Lester, William Henry Maitland and Sylvia Gertrude Brooks.

A past due promissory note for $720 is basis for action in case of State Bank of Dows vs. O. Bellman of Dows.

Jennie Short of Goldfield seeks to collect an $8000 note made in favor of W. H. Short by Chas. Troyer, H. C. Wiser et al in March, 1920, and later assigned to this plaintiff. Judgment is also asked for interest in the sum of $770.

Emma Johnson of Belmond and Clarion wants a decree of divorce from her husband Geo. M. Johnson, charging cruel and inhuman treatment as well as the use of vile and abusive language.

First National bank of Clarion petitions the court for a judgment of $1487.61 against E. M. and A. C. Amundson, being the balance due on a $1900 note.

S. E. Steussy brings action on a $100 note executed by G. H. and Clara Jameson of Dows in favor of J. R. Paul and later assigned to the plaintiff.

State Bank of Woolstock brings action against R. T. and Harriet McDaniel on their note and mortgage for $2500, which at present time aggregates $3142.25.

Paul Hecox vs. Mitchell Sales Co. of Clarion is a suit to collect the sum of $455.15 alleged to be balance due for services rendered said auto company as a mechanic.

Mrs. Mary Sullivan of Belmond is suing Thos. McNulty, Sr., for $3000 damages, asking $1000 on three separate counts. Plaintiff was adopted by Mr. and Mrs. John Kelly when nine years of age, and lived with them until 1902, when she married M. F. Sullivan. During the summer of 1922 her foster mother was sick a large part of the time and this plaintiff came from her home in Minnesota to visit her. About this time plaintiff alleges the defendant made slanderous remarks about her, telling P. W. Kaufman and others that she was a "thief" and steals everything she gets her hand on".

Oscar and Joseph Sime of Dows ask the foreclosure of a certain mortgage made by Irwin and Matie Clay in the sum of $36,782.12, also judgment for interest, taxes, etc., aggregating nearly $3000. The land on which the mortgage was given contains several acres of valuable hard wood and other timber; at various times defendants have cut down and removed and converted to their own use about twelve acres of such timber; that the removal of such timber lessens the value of the entire tract and for that reason an order of court is asked restaining further removal of the timber.

BELMOND TEAMS TAKE CLARION TO CLEANING

Boys And Girls Both Win Their Games Friday By Good-Sized Scores.

The long looked for Belmond-Clarion basket ball game was played Friday at the High school gym, before the largest crowd of the season. The house was packed. We wish to say here, that we appreciate the patronage and support, that the community has given us thus far.

Both Belmond teams have been very successful this season. The boys team having won every game to date, and the girls loosing but one, by a close margin.

The girls showed considerable improvement since their last game with Garner,. Passing, guarding and shooting basket was remarkable. The work of Grace Leavy at forward was easily the outsanding star being credited with 7 basket and two free throws. The girls won 23 to 3. The girls played Hampton girls last Saturday night. Details of the game have not been learned.

The boys game was expected to be hard fought but on the contrary Belmond easily won 26 to 5. At intermissions the score was 10 to 1.

The Belmond boys have developed a strong defensive team. All but one team have been unable to secure more than 8 points. Their offensive was considerable better after intermissions. Their team work has been better and in this point of play a great deal of practice is necessary. The ball on both sides was passed to an opponent time and time again. Belmond showed its superiority immediately after the game started, caging two baskets within two minutes of play and thus maintained the lead. The work of Madison and L. Parsons was up to standard. E. Christie's floor work was fast. Breckenridge was perhaps the outstanding player for Clarion.

Line up:

Belmond		Clarion
Madison	L. F.	Crabtree
Parsons	R. F.	Wilson
Tyrrell	C.	Hill
Christie	L. G.	Crabtree
Stapley	R. G.	Breckenridge

Summary:

Madison baskets 5, Parsons 5, Tyrrell 1, Wilson 1, Weber 1, free throws, Madison 1 out of 4, Parsons 3 out of 4, Crabtree 1 out of 4. Substitutions: Sam Leinbach for Stapley, Vestweber for Tyrrell, Thilgtin for Christie, Roger Leinbach for Parsons.

GASOLINE TAX TO PAVE WRIGHT COUNTY ROADS

The news is authority for the statement that the proposed bill by Senator Caldwell, which would place a tax of two cents per gallon on all gasoline used in the state for the purpose of paving 3,000 miles of roads, would pave the Wilson highway, running thru the county and also the No. 10 road, running across the county east and west. It is planned to pave the Wilson highway from Ames to Garner as part of the system to be hard surfaced. It is estimated that $7,000,000 a year would be paid into the fund from this tax. Piling two cents on top of what John D. already extorts, will seem like adding insult to injury to a lot of car owners, but if in the end real roads were forthcoming it would be worth the price. But would we get them?

The bill provides that $5,000 yearly shall be paid to the road fund of the various counties each year in addition to the building of the roads. $1,000 is to go to each township road fund also.

ST. OLAF CHURCH

Thursday afternoon at 2:30 the cottage prayer meeting will be held at the home of Andrew Scott.

Wednesday afternoon, January 31 the North Ladies Aid meets at the home of Jacob Thompson.

Next Sunday morning English service will be held at the church at 11:00 o'clock. We would like to see all, but especially the young.

FARM BUREAU MEET AT ROWAN FEBRUARY 6

There will be a Farm Bureau meeting at the Hugh Whitten farm, three miles north and one mile east of Rowan, on Tuesday, February 6. Some good speakers have been arranged for a good program is to be given, and special music. The usual good eats will be on deck. Everyone is welcome to attend.

COMMERCIAL MEETINGS

Various towns around are holding meetings of their commercial clubs, for the purpose of getting together, comparing notes on the past year's tussle, and sizing up the year ahead. Among the recent meetings were those of the Hampton and Humboldt commercial organizations. A similar affair would be a big help in Belmond—but what's the use?

SHERIFF ROBB DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Eagle Grove was at home to Sheriff Robb Saturday evening and a good sized audience turned out to his lecture on "The End of the Law" at the high school auditorium.

His lecture is divided into two parts, either of which is worth more than the price of admission. He tells in an intensely entertaining manner his experiences overseas with the Iowa boys and interesting sidelights on his two years' battle with the underworld in Des Moines.

He says that ninety per cent of the crime in Iowa is committed by Iowa criminals. The Iowa crook resents an invasion of out-of-Iowa talent and is very likely to give officers the tip if Omaha crooks have planned to pull off something in Iowa. The state institutions are now overflowing with inmates and new buildings are being prepared to house them. As a minister and as an observer of years standing, Mr. Robb believes that the only remedy is the extension of the influence of the church in every nook and corner of this great state.

When Mr. Robb has concluded his formal lecture he goes to his stereoptican machine, located in the middle of the auditorium, sits down and talks about the pictures of his experiences as they are thrown on the screen. He has many close-up views of famous Iowa criminals, scenes of their crimes, intimate pictures of the hanging of Orrie Cross and Eugene Weeks. Mr. Robb agrees with Judge Utterback that Cross should not have been hung, but believes that Eugene Weeks should have been hung—one hanging is hardly enough for so vile a charater as Weeks—he should go through another.

There is no lecturer on the platform today who gives more genuine entertainment in two hours time and at the same time puts across a message which accomplishes as much real benefit as Sheriff Robb.—Eagle.

JOINT INSTALLATION

The I. O. O. F.. and Rebekah lodges of Clarion held joint installation at their lodge room last Thursday night. There were visitors from Eagle Grove, Goldfield, Dows and Belmond. A banquet took place at 6:30, over 180 being present. After the tables were cleared away the room was prepared for installation. M. Ray Duer, D. D. P. of Clarion, Miss Nellie Akers, D. D P. of Dows, were the installing officers.

The work was interesting and nicely done, showing that these lodges make a success of whatever they undertake. The hall was prettily decorated in lodge colors. After the installation work was finished, a platform was hastily erected and the home talent ministrels kept the crowd in merriment for an hour. The Clarion lodges certainly made everyone welcome. The Belmond delegation was invited to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Johnson, where the two hours of waiting for the train were socially spent. Those from Belmond were the Mesdames T. N. Davenport, Hawley, Thiltgen, E. M. Lathrop, M. R. Pierce, Geo. Coburn, and L. L. Lathrop.

COUNTIES GET NEW NUMBERS

Blackhawk county will have six as its distinguishing number. Increase in automobile over the 10,000 mark is responsible for the change. As it is possible to put but six numerals on the Iowa license tag it was necessary to drop the county number of Blackhawk to a single numeral.

Adair county's number this year is 7, Adams 8, Allamakee 9, Appanoose 10, Aubudon 11, and Benton 12.

Truck numbers will start with 50,001, anything over 50,000 on an Iowa plate being a truck.

ASSESSORS MEETING

The several assessors of Wright county met at the court house in Clarion on Saturday, January 6th.

Friends in Belmond have learned of the death at Chicago of J. W. Riley, a former resident of Belmond many years ago. Death was caused by gas. Deceased had arisen to prepare breakfast when escaping gas fumes over came him. He was over 70 years of age. Funeral services were held Monday.

Great Crowds In Attendance

All Departments Are Crammed With Exhibits And Competition Is Keen.

SAID TO BE THE BEST EVER

Big crowds were attending Belmond's big two-day short course the past two days, and the event has been beyond question one of the best of its kind ever held in Wright county. An immense quantity of exhibits were on display in all the departments, and the quality of the exhibits was a superior to anything heretofore shown.

The live stock departments were jammed with exhibits from Belmond and vicinity, and the places reserved proved too small to handle the amount entered. Close to 100 hogs were on display, and between 40 and 50 cattle, with heavy entries in sheep. Yet, despite the handicap of room, the program as arranged was carried thru in fine shape thru the able efforts of the committe chairmen.

Judging started Tuesday afternoon, but so large was the list of entries, and so excellent in quality, that stock judging was not finished until noon of Wednesday. Half an hour, for instance was spent in trying to pick the best of two swine specimens, so close were their qualifications.

Grain and poultry were very well exhibited, and some very fine birds were shown.

In the domestic science department the entries were heavy and competition keen. Some splendid examples of the domestic art were on display in both cooking and sewing.

The complete list of prize winners in the various departments will be found on page 3 of the Independent this week. In order to give our readers a souvineer of the occasion, the list was printed in full page size, loose, so that it can be removed from the paper and saved. In case any subscriber failed to receive this page, please call the office, 115, and one will be immediately sent.

Belmond can feel proud of the success of its Short Course this year, for it was beyond any doubt a real "hum dinger."

In the write up of the raid at Rowan last week, the statement was made that Lloyd Waite had five gallons of booze in his possession. This was a mistake, as Lloyd did not have the booze, it was his brother, Claire, who was arrested with this amount in his possession at the time.

The sale of Parks and Gelder, held Tuesday, was one of the best of the season. Their milk cows sold at $90, a team for $300, one gelding for $157, and other things in proportion. Cowley, Munnis, and Rankins were the auctioeers, and they rattled the sale thru in two hours and 40 minutes. The sale came to a thousand dollars more than the owners expected. A large crowd was present.

BABBITT

When "Main Street" struck the American public a great howl went up; it was declared an uncalled for slam on American ideals and a ridicule of American life. Now that Sinclair Lewis' new book, "Babbitt," has taken the place of Main street, another roar is ascending. Main street and Babbitt are greatly similar Lewis could see some good in the small town, despite the severity of his ridicular. There were some human characters, and real heart interest episodes, and a large part of the story was only too disgustingly true to life. But in Babbitt the author sees no good in anything or anybody; from beginning to end every character is either a crook, a grafter, a rue, a pin head or a wishy-washy social pest. Lewis sees no good anywhere. Babbitt, as a character, is true enough to a certain element—even in Belmond—but certainly not to the folks who make up American towns. The book sounds like it might have been written by an Englishman, Kipling for instance—who had spent two weeks in America; been entertained by a bunch of dough-head social climbers who were likewise exceedingly conceited; and then gone home and tried to write the great American social novel with the "facts" he had gathered. It cannot be gainsaid that Sinclair Lewis knows human nature—knows it to a frazzle—and that he writes entertainingly. But he overdraws; his characters are exaggerated, his episodes distorted. You find the resemblance of a certain degree of social life and people, but out of proportion. His books lack that fineness which creats a reality in the mind of his readers.

Yet, in an entirely unexpected ending, Babbitt turns human, decidedly human, and the book leaves a better taste than you had hopes of.

CLIPPINGS

Fred Becker began packing ice Monday. He is hauling from Clear Lake with trucks and teams. The ice is only about a foot thick but is of very fine quality. Train loads are being loaded at Clear Lake every day and much is being hauled by trucks and teams to nearby towns. Britt parties have been hauling for several days.—Garner Signal.

The little two year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ubbe Doden was badly, and as yet it is not known how seriously burned Thursday morning. The child had a catalog that she was playing with pushing it in and out of the grate. The leaves readily caught fire, also some cobs in a box nearby. The child's clothes were ignited and before the flames could be extinguished she had been badly burned especially deep over the entire abdomen. She was rushed to Algona to the hospital where she is being care for and where she is in a critical condition.—Titonka Topic.

Buttermaker Conway tells us that after checking up last year's business, he finds that in 1922 the Garner creamery received 160,000 pounds more cream than in the year 1921. That is certainly some increase in receipts, and we judge that the difference is largely in increased production.—Garner Signal.

Several Clarion parties have been issuing worthless checks the past week or so in payment of store bills. One day last week a couple of them came to grief, a man and a woman. Both were arrested and made acquainted with the law in such case and needless to say they lost no time in squaring matters at their own expense. Others of their kind should be treated in a like manner.—Monitor.

Carl Abend, of near Estherville, went to Germany some time ago, and took all the good American dollars he had, and he had a lot, and invested them in German marks. Recently he returned to America stone broke. He came back with the hope of making more dollars here, though it is safe to say that he will not invest any more money he earns in the German mark.—Humboldt Republican.

The Clarion Municipal band held their first rehearsal for the season last Thursday evening. It takes weeks of hard practice to prepare for the summer concerts and this year the band is getting started early. They are anticipating a couple of concerts in nearby towns as well as one or two inside concerts here at home this spring.—Monitor.

Mr. and Mrs. John Spitler of Belmond were business callers at the county seat Friday, taking advantage of the clearance sale bargains.—Monitor.

Miss Kate Walker spent Monday afternoon in Belmond.—Monitor.

Mr. Dorr, of Belmond, was in this city Friday, looking after matters of business.—Klemme Times.

Mr. and Mrs. J. N Day drove over to Belmond Friday on business and also to visit friends.—Times.

Last week we heard a merchant say: 'My best adv. is a satisfied customer." This man was right so far as he went, but he didn't go far enough. What he lacked was a means of publicity. His satisfied customer who failed to communicate his feelings to someone else did not bring any additional trade to that store. Of course if that store had enough satisfied customers who spent their time carrying the news that Jim Jones was selling groceries very cheap, and was also selling very satisfying and dependable groceries then it could hope to increase its trade because of those satisfied customers, But satisfied customers do not act that way. They may pass the word on to a few, but they will be very few.

TAKE ANNUAL BIRD CENSUS

The following practice of the past several years, the annual Christmas bird census of the United States has been taken again this year.

For a number of years it has been the custom at Christmas time for persons who are familiar with birds to go out for a period of four hours at Christmas time and to make a record of the birds seen. Such notations are collected from all over the United States and in an early number of Birds Lore a magazine devoted to matters of interest to bird lovers, a complete record of the census is published.

This year at Ames, J. E. Guthrie of the department of entomology at Iowa State College and Mrs. F. L. Battell, a resident of Ames, were the ones to count the bird noses. Trips were made in two directions from town and altogether a total of 13 species and 300 individuals were seen. Cardinal, junco, hairy and downy woodpecker, greathorned owl, bluejay, red-tailed hawk, tree sparrow, chicadee, nut hatches and brown creeper were among those noticed on the trips

English sparrows and the more domesticated birds are not included in the count. Of the wild birds, crows were said to have made up half of the total number.

"A relatively common and especially valuable bird for the farmer," says Mr. Guthrie, "is the tree sparrow. I saw about 30 of them while I was out. The tree sparrow feeds largely upon weed seeds. F. E. L. Beal, writing on that species in 1881, estimated that in the state of Iowa alone the tree sparrow ate a total of 875 tons of weed seeds in a single year.

Mr. Guthrie says the number of the birds now is about the same as at that time.

CODE REVISION IS STARTED

Des Moines, Jan. 22 1923.—It is clear that the agricultural interests if Iowa will get anything they demand from the present General Assembly. Not only is there a majority of ten or more farmers in the membership of the two houses, but the other interests represented there are sympathetic to the farmers' need and condition. They all want the farmers of Iowa to prosper and get all that is coming to them in the way of state aid and benefits, so long as the demands shall be reasonable and practicable—not visionary, radical or ruinous of other industries. On a test or two already it has been demonstrated that the farmer members themselves will not all line up on every proposition, right or wrong. Most of them want to be shown; demand to know the reason and the results expected before they will accept anything as final. But simply playing politics or "soaking" some other interest is not the program of the more progressive members we have interviewed up to this time.

Committees Announced

When the General Assembly reconvened last week after a four days' recess and consideration of things as they developed the first week, everybody was agog with expectation and intrest in the committeeships to be handed out by the speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. Most of the effective and real work of a legislator is in the committees. He may sit all day long in an open session, listen to motions, arguments and pleas, and vote and vote, with apparently little influence on the proceedings. But when he is in a committee of ten or a dozen members, with a bill under consideration, he may scan it at leisure, demand the facts concerning every phase of it, and there vote with ten times the power he may exercise on the floor of the open session. As chairman of a committee a member may name sub-committees on any pending bill in his committee and hurry it or delay it, meantime gathering strength for its aid or for its defeat. Therefore chairmanship of any good committee is much desired by active and influential members. If interested along some particlar line of business or public work, a chairmanship in line with that interest is usually sought.

Chairmanships are likewise considered from these same standpoints by the presiding officers who hand them out. The results is always some disappointments and sore spots when the list is announced and usually there is pleasure and satisfaction with those favored.

There are over forty different committees in each house of the General

Kinseth's Store News

We sure were glad to see so many of you at the Short Course. And we want to say right here, folks, that it was some event, with some of the finest stock we ever saw, and we are familiar with the farm too. It is a source of pleasure to us to know that in our little way, we helped to put it over. And we hope that next year will see another still better Short Course held in Belmond.

Did you see the good things the ladies had! Umm! Boy!

And say, folks, speaking of canned goods, we have a big special we are offering you this week—six cans of good stuff—one each of peaches, pears, plums, Hominy, luncheon beans and blackberries, and at only $1.38. Now you know yourself that this is a mighty small price for good canned goods like these. And they are good—if they aren't, you just bring us the empty can, give us your word the contents weren't good, and you'll get your money back. Because we pride ourselves on our goods, and they've got to good. So just phone 19, say "send me that $1.38 special," and pretty soon you'll hear a "honk" outside and that'll be us. We deliver any any old time you want.

And we got a soap special—on Swift's—12 bars for 49c. And 2 boxes of soap flakes thrown in free.

And we have shoes that fit and wear, and outing flannel a yard wide at 23c and coffee for 38c and in fact bargains in everything So don't forget the Store on the Corner

Everything Points To the Greatest Spring Demand for Ford Products In Company's History

1,202,517 Ford Cars and Trucks were delivered to retail purchasers in the United States alone during 1922—

Actual deliveries for last month greatly exceeded any previous December in the history of the Ford Motor Company—

It was the ninth consecutive month in which more than 100,000 Ford Cars and Trucks were retailed—keeping the Ford Plants working at capacity to meet dealers' requirements—

In many parts of the country dealers are already finding it necessary to specify later delivery dates on certain types because there are no reserve stocks to draw from—

Commercial users, business houses and farmers, anticipating their future requirements, are placing orders and taking delivery of Ford Cars, Trucks and Fordson Tractors to insure against delay.

Everything points to the biggest shortage of Ford Products this Spring that has ever existed—

The only way you can be sure of obtaining delivery of a Ford Car, Truck or Fordson Tractor is to list your order immediately—

We have given you these facts as they actually exist so that if you are planning to purchase a Ford Car, Truck or Tractor for use this Spring or Summer, you can list your order now and take advantage of our dealer's first opportunity to make delivery.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Successful Show at Rowan

The two day short course or agricultural exhibit which was held at Rowan, Tuesday and Wednesday of last week, January 16 and 17, proved to be a most interesting and instructive occasion for the people of Rowan and the surrounding community. Both days were crammed full of valuable information in the form of lectures and demonstrations by the different specialists which were engaged for this course.

One of the interesting features of the first day's program was the junior live stock judging contest which was conducted by the Wright county agent in co-operation with County Agent Hamilton of Franklin county. Twenty-six boys from Wright and Franklin counties were enrolled in this judging contest, including boys from Rowan, Clarion, Dows, Galt, Alexander, Hampton, Goldfield, Belmond. and Latimer The boys were required to judge one class each of horse, cattle, hogs and sheep, also one class of corn and were graded on the basis of fifty per cent for placing and fifty per cent on reasons. The judging brought out some keen competition and indicated to the two county agents where judging material may be found for next year's work. This junior judging contest created considerable interest among the live stock breeders and it is thought that such a judging conest is very practical from the standpoint of a fram boy who should be able to know good live stock when he sees it. Out of a possible five hundred points for correct placings and reasons, the ranking of the contestants is as follows:

1st, Lester Olson, Alexander, 424 points.
2nd, Fred Moellering, Rowan, 417 points.
3rd, Edward Campbell, Clarion, 406 points.
4th, Lewis Schomberg, Alexander, 401 points.
5th, Harold Moellering, Rowan, 392 points.
6th Duane Bingham, Rowan, 386 points.

Miss Florence Imlay from the extension department at Ames conducted the exhibit of ladies' fancy work, cooking, sewing, and so forth at the Congregational church. The ladies of the Rowan community surely brought out some very fine exhibits in this department of the short course. The showing which was made in this department of the exhibit surely indicates that the ladies of the community are very necessary in holding a successful short course in any community. The ladies in charge of this department of the exhibit as well as those who showed their products should be congratulated upon the splendid showing which was made at Rowan. Miss Imlay gave a very interesting address on Tuesday afternoon and succeeded in holding the interest of the ladies present for about one hour and a half. Her address was very interesting as well as practical and to the point. Miss Imlay's work was highly pleasing especially because of the personal interest which she seemed to take in the ladies who were present.

The poultry exhibit which was held in connection with the Rowan short course was a great success from the standpoint of the number of entries recorded and the high class poultry which came from all parts of Wright and Franklin counties. E. R. Ballou, of Rowan, poultry association, was in charge of this department of the Rowan short course and succeeded in providing suitable pens for all exhibitors. The boys' and girls' poultry club exhibit proved to be an interesting feature of this department of the short course. There were about 15 or 20 entries in the Junior Poultry club department, with entries from Eagle Grove, Clarion, Belmond, Goldfield, Alexander, Dows, Hampton, and Rowan. The winnings in the Junior Poultry club department are as follows:

Pullets

1st, William Henn, Belmond.
2nd, Thelma Streveler, Rowan.
3rd, Earl Mickelson, Clarion.

Cockerels

1st, Tillie Henn, Belmond.
2nd, Earl Mickelson, Clarion.
3rd, Earl Mickelson, Clarion.

Trio

1st, Earl Mickelson, Clarion.
2nd, Tillie Henn, Belmond.
3rd, Earl Mickelson, Clarion.

Professor W. H. Lapp of the extension department at Ames, judged the poultry exhibit and gave a very interesting lecture on poultry and poultry problems in the afternoon of the first day, at the moving picture show. Professor Lapp is considered one of the best authorities in Iowa on poultry problems and he surely gave out some valuable points at the Rowan exhibit on poultry work

The outstanding feature of the Rowan short course was the splendid exhibit of live stock from a territory immediately surrounding the town. The showing which was made in the live stock department very clearly indicates the quality live stock which may be found in the eastern part of Wright county, also the intense interest which has been created for good live stock in this community. Every breeder who exhibited at this short course (and breeders from Hampton, Clarion Dows, Belmond, Galt, Alexander, and Rowan were showing) was highly pleased with the live stock exhibit. This exhibit of some of the best live stock of Wright county will no doubt, be a great advertisement for Rowan and its live stock pavilion. Professor E. L. Quaife judged all live stock in this department and judging from some of the reports. Mr. Quaife was highly satisfactory to all breeders who exhibited. The interesting part of Mr. Quaife's work was, he not only judged the animals but he actually pointed out the good points as well as the faults, in comparing the different animals. The instruction given out by Mr. Quaife will no doubt, be long remembered by the breeders of Wright and Franklin counties.

The afternoon of the second day of the short course was spent in finishing up the judging of the live stock exhibits, also a lecture from Professor E. E. Quaife on animal husbandry. Professor Quaife is a keen wide-awake fellow who is a good judge of live stock and the Rowan people were very fortunate in securing the services of such a good judge. He seemed to fit in nicely at this exhibit and surely proved his ability to judge good live stock. Professor F. G. Churchill had charge of the farm crops exhibit in the same building where the poultry was shown. Some splendid samples of corn, oats and other small grains were brought out and shown in classes when the competition was quite keen. Professor Churchill gave a fine address on farm crops, in the stock pavilion, following the lecture by Mr. Quaife on live stock. Mr. Churchill brought out many points of interest in connection with the planting, cultivating, and harvesting of soy beans, alfalfa and Hubam clover.

Hog Cholera Vaccination School Valuable

The school of insturction for the use of hog cholera serum and virus which was held in the court room of Clarion last Thursday and Friday, January 18 and 19, was attended by about fifty farmers from different parts of Wright county.

Twenty-six men who were presnt at the meeting made application for the permits to use the hog cholera serum and virus and took examinations on the work on Friday afternoon.

Dr. J. S. Craft, extension veterinarian from Ames, was in charge of this school of instruction and conducted the work in a way which was very interesting and instructive. Dr. Craft lectlred to the men all day Thursday on the diseases of hogs and gave out valuable information on the diagnois and treatment for these diseases. On Friday morning a post-mortem examination was held over four or five diseased pigs in an effort to discover what disease was affecting them. In all cases it was found that the pigs were affected by parasites only.

Belmond and Woolstock Short Courses

The Belmond short course which has been planned and organized for the past year or more is being held this week and the people of that community are living up to their old record of holding a very interesting agricultural exhibit at that place.

We understand that over four hundred dollars in cash premiums is being offered for the best exhibit in the various classes. This short course has been in the proces of making for over a year and with the spirit of cooperation which exists in the Belmond community, this should be the most successful exhibit of its kind ever held in Belmond.

A meeting was held in Woolstock last Saturday afternoon, January 20, for the purpose of planning and organizing a short course for Woolstock and surrounding territory and now the short course has been assured.

Representative committee members were present from Wall Lake, Woolstock, and Troy townships of Wright county, also from two townships of Hamilton county. The county agent from both Wright and Hamilton counties were present and assisted with the meeting. It has been planned to hold a two day short course, February 15 and 17. Arrangements have been made or Professor Hauser to judge the grain and farm crops, Professor W. H. Lapp, the poultry exhibit, Professor Beanblossom the live stock exhibit and each one of these specialists will give a lecture on his particular subject. It has been planned to have the lectures on the different subjects held in Woolstock and have the live stock exhibit in town also All farmers in the vicinity of Woolstock are urged to begin preparing their grain and live stock exhibits to show at this mid-winter agricultural exhibit which is scheduled for February 15 and 16.

Interesting Socials Held

An interesting community social was held at the Wall Lake Center school house last Tuesday evening when the regular monthly Wall Lake township farm bureau was held. R. E. Mosher, newly elected director of that township, was in charge of the meeting which consisted of a lively program by the local school and several special musical numbers. The county agent was present and gave an interesting short talk on the activities of the organization and explained briefly the plans for the Woolstock short course and urged all members to be thinking and planning for this occasion.

The Merle Peck home, east of Clarion, was the scene of a lively community social last Friday evening when their farm home was packed by their friends and neighbors who had gathered to give them a farewell party as Mr. and Mrs. Peck are moving out of Wright county and out of the state next month. A short talk was given by the county agent in which he gave a brief report of the state convention of the Iowa Farm Bureau federation and an explanation of the boys' and girls' club work. Rev. H. L. Lewis of the Christian church of Clarion was present and gave an interesting address on community organization. While Rev. Lewis is not a farmer, his address would indicate he has lived in an agricultural community where the cooperative buying and selling agencies have been developed quite extensively. This address was followed by refreshments being served by the ladies of Grant township.

Assembly, hence members must serve on a number of committees. Usually two or three important committee assignments are given a member along with several unimportant ones, and with these he can keep just as busy and work just as hard as he wishes to during the entire session. or he can evade his responsiblities and do nothing at all. He has no boss.

Senate Chairmanships

Lieutenant-Governor Hammill is conceded to have done a very nice job of matching up the working committees of the Senate. He gave the chief chairmanships to strong members whose interests are shown, and he balanced up the membership of large committees with opposing forces so that legislation will be at least fairly treated by them. He made four of theleading and powerful committees so large this year that a unanimous report from any one of them will carry a bill through the Senate. These are Ways and Means, Appropriations, Agriculture and Highways. The chairmanships were announced as follows:

Ways and Means—Senator Smith of Madison county.

Appropriations—Senator Stoddard of Woodbury county.

Agriculture—Senator Buser of Muscatine county.

Judiciary No. 1—Senator Reed of Howard county.

House Committee Chairmen

Speaker Anderson of the House finally got his committees shaped up and announced last Tuesday also. The House by resolution eliminated a few committees appointed in other sessions, and limited the size of many others. This tends to efficiency and speed. In the past so many members have been named on the appropriations, ways and means and agriculture committees had to wait for want of a quorum. The Speaker's assignments of chairmanships was as follows:

Agriculture—Brady of O'Brien.

Animal Industry—Children of Pottawattamie.

Appropriations—Hauge of Polk.

Banks and Banking—Donhowe of Story.

Board of Control—Lake of Woodbury.

Private Corporations—Doolittle of Delaware.

Digestible Calf Feed

The feeding requirements of a calf deserves a good deal of study. Every man who feeds stock knows that when feeding whole corn or oats a large portion of it is not digested. When feeding calves for market or as an addition to your herd, you cannot reasonably expect them to develope quickly if their digestive organs fail to absorb the nutrition in 12 to 26 per cent of the wasted feed. The wise farmer feeds ground corn and grain made with a McCormick-Deering Feed Grinder. He saves this 26 per cent waste. He raises better calves and a better herd. And this McCormick-Deering Feed Grinder pays for itself in a very short time. Why can't you, too, have this profit-making machine? It's easy to get, because you can buy it from us.

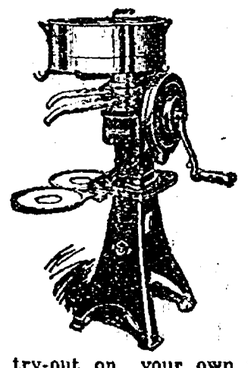
Many a wife without an aim hits her husband just the same!

We want to congratulate every winner at the Short Course, both in Belmond and at Rowan. Such events as the Short Course tend to make better grain and better stock for the man who farms, and hereby make him more money. We're for them, and mighty glad to help in any way to make one a success.

Both the winter days and womens' skirts are now getting longer.

Come In And Give It A Spin

We've got one of those new Ball-Bearing Primrose Cream Separators on the floor here. The crank is waiting for you to grab ahold of it. Come in and give it a spin! Listen to the smooth sing as the bowl speeds up! You'll think you're turning a much smaller capacity machine—it turns so easily. The Ball Bearings make the difference. You'll like the Primrose once you try your hand at it—and you'll like it even better after a try-out on your own place. Don't be content with anything else—the Primrose gives you large capacity, minimum friction and wear, slow easy turning, and long life. Come in and give it a trial.



An apt illustration of mingled hope and fear is a lazy man looking for work.

No matter how scarce other things may become, there will always be plenty of wool to pull over people's eyes.

THE COUNTRY NEWSPAPER
By Anna Campbell

An hour a week I give to memory,
That's when the old home paper comes to me—
The only link that binds that life to this
And brings back days that I try not to miss.
I read the personals and learn they made
A right smart showing at the Ladies' Aid.
And I can taste again the home-made cake
And spicy cookies mother used to make.
I read with sorrow of the passing on
Of some dear friend I loved in days now gone,
And someone's babe I held upon my knee
Is married now! How old I've grown to be!
I read the ads, and stroll with eager feet
Down that familiar shady wide Main Street;
I see the windows of the Town Bazaar
And nod at folks and ask them how they are.
The paper the newsboy sells each day
Is lots more clever, I am bound to say.
This town's too big for them to pause to tell
That Mrs. Andy Currie's getting well
But just such items I am glad to see
When the home paper comes each week to me.
Across the miles my lonely spirit wends
To chat awhile with older, dearer friends!

NAIL HAMPTON BOOTLEGGER

Hampton Chronicle.—Guy Moore, whose name is already famous in Franklin county as the greatest booze manufacturer and bootlegger ever captured in the county, is once more in the hands of the law. Moore was arrested before daylight last Thursday morning over in Morgan township near Dows, by Deputy Sheriff A. P. Millett and Detective C. W. Wood. of the Burns Detective Agency in Chicago, for complicity in passing a check for $1,600 on a spurious bank which was represented as existing at Northwood, Iowa in a big booze deal in Chicago on December 9, 1922..

Moore in company with one Joe Beyer, of Des Moines, and a third party, whose name and residence are not known and who was really the guilty man in passing the check, were making a deal for booze with a bootlegger in Chicago and the third party offered a cashier's check on a Northwood, Iowa, bank, which did not exist, in payment for the booze. The bootlegger would not accept the check because he did not know any of the three men well enough to be sure that they were not "financial" crooks. Beyer then suggested getting the endorsement of one A. S. Kirhart, living in the Brevoort Hotel, a former Des Moines saloon keeper, who was known to the bootlegger. The men then went to Kirhart and in securing his endorsement Moore stated that he had seen the third party purchase the certified check at the bank in Northwood. As a matter of fact Moore and the other man had driven thru Northwood from Albert Lea, Minnesota, where Moore is now living, on their way to Chicago after the booze, and the third man had requested Moore to stop at Northwood while he went into the bank on business. Moore now claims the man did go into some bank and was gone for several minutes and that shortly after they had left Northwood the man howed him the cashier's check for $1,600.

The check was returned within a week or two and Kirhart turned it over to his bankers and they gave it to the American Bankers Association, who in turn handed it to the Burns Detective Agency with the instructions that they get the man who passed it. The case was assigned to Wood and he immediately went to Des Moines where he located Beyer and found that Beyer was ready and anxious to help locate Moore, "the guy who double-crossed me" as Beyer put it.

Wood and Bever went to Albert Lea but found that Moore was not at home. However, they learned that he was over at Dows, or in that neighborhood so they immediately went to Dows, Moore's former "place of business," and there they found that no one had seen Moore, but that he was "due" there almost any time. It wasn't long before they had a line on Moore and on Thursday morning, about 4:00 o'clock, Deputy Sheriff A. P. Millett, Wood and Beyer armed with a warrant for the arrest of a fugitive from justice, pulled him out of bed at the John Jacobsen home in Morgan township, about two miles east of Dows, and brot him to Hampton for a hearing.

Moore had his preliminary hearing before Judge D. W. Parks on January 5th. Judge Parks fixed Moore's bonds at $2,500 and he could not raise the necessary amount for his release so he remained in the county jail until last Tuesday when he was taken back to Chicago by Special Agent McCormick, sent here from Chicago. All efforts to make Moore talk and give information concerning the third party in the booze tranaction were in vain, but McCormick was sure that Moore would tell all he knew about the matter when he was given the third degree in Chicago.

INJURED BY DYNAMITE

Chas. Sargent, one of the contractors n a gravel pit near Garner was very badly injured in a dynamite explosion recently, when a charge prematurely exploded. Sargent with some of his men, had placed a stick of dynamite to loosen the gravel with about a foot and a half of fuse attached to the explosive. Using a blow torch to light the fuse, he applied it. It did not seem to burn and Sargent again applied the torch. The fuse, however, had ignited at the first trial and as Sargent bent down to make the second attempt, the charge went off. His face was blown full of gravel and rock, one eye was entirely blown out, and his head and face so badly torn that he was nearly unrecognizable. He was rushed to Garner where he was given first aid, and then taken to a hospital at Mason City where he is in a very critical condition. It is hoped to save one eye, but if he lives he will be scarred for life. It is generally thought that he was careless, as he is experienced in handling explosives.

Ready for Code Revision

There was an amusing skirmish in both House and Senate after the committees were announced, with Code revision the innocent bystander and suffering the consequence. While possibly a majority of both houses believe it impossible to complete the revision of the Code of Iowa at this regular session, and while some members absolutely refused to vote to consider doing such a thing, still a large majority of the House proved to be in favor of at least trying to do the job, and taking the governor's word that it can be accomplished or that he will call a special session later to complete the work if an honest attempt is made to reise the Code at this session even though a special session costs $150,000. Representative Children of Pottawattamie county led the opposition to adoption of the Code revision committee's report favoring an attempt to do the work, and Representative McClune of Mahaska county made a fight for adoption of the report and going ahead with the Code revision. The latter was sustained by a vote of 78 to 20.

In the meatime the Senate had been marking time awaiting the House action. When the verdict of the farmer-ruled House came so strong for work on the Code there was the amusing political play to square things. Senator Price of Monroe county had been filibustering against any action whatever, and held the Senate till 6:15 Tuesday evening with a speech. That night he sought a compromise, however and it came in the adoption of a Senate rule providing that until February 1st only Code revision commission bills shall be considered first and after that time general legislative business shall have preference.

Spend Day Reading Titles

Under the constitution the complete titles to all "bills or acts" must be read three times in each house. Twice these titles are read before the bills are ready to be referred to committees. On their third and final reading the whole bill is read and is placed on its passage to become a law or be killed. Reading of the titles commenced Thursday afternoon in both House and Senate and the hufdrum voice of the reading clerk soothed the law-makers to sleep or failed to interrupt them at other work until Friday noon.

Code revision bills are numbered from 1 to 262. Regular session bills take their numbers from 263 on up to the limit. Code bills are largely for consolidation of numerous laws scattered all through the various Codes and Code Supplements for years. Their redrafting thus might cause some changes in existing laws and on final adoption such bills may be amended in either house to make a complete change or partical change in any law. Thus every interest in Iowa, is involved in this Code revision, and every interest is repesented in the General Assembly or by special representatives on the floor or in the lobbies. There is a mighty chance for slick work and sculduggery, and the members all know it They are watching each other and everybody during the revision ordeal. There will be many a scrap over little details, and many a slip in consequence.

Regular Bills Numerous

In both House and Senate the regular bills offered since theopening of the session were all read on Thursday. These numbered up to 25 in the Senate and to forty in the House, and covered many very important propositions.

Possibly the greatest bill proposed is that offered by Senator Caldwell of Mahaska county providing for a two cent per gallon tax on gasoline purchased within this state. Men learned in figures say this law if passed will yield around seven million dollars per year revenue to the state. Senator Caldwell has designed the bill to provide for paving trunk highways across the state as fast as the funds will do it. About five such trunk lines may thus cross the state each way. A part—25 per cent— of the present primary road money is to go to secondary roads and some of it to township roads so that they may be kept in good condition. It is provided also that gasoline to be used for agricultural purpose shall not bear the tax.

A reduction in present automobile license fees will doubtless follow if this bill is finally passed.

An extra number of the Caldwell bill was ordered printed so that it may be sent to interested parties all over the state.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved.

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

"When did you get this?" Eaton asked, looking out.

"Just now. That message came through yesterday some time and was waiting for you at Simons; when we got them this morning they sent it on."

"I see; thanks." Eaton, assured that if the conductor had seen anything he suspected no significance in what he saw, closed his curtains and buttoned them carefully. The conductor moved on. Eaton took a small English-Chinese pocket dictionary from his vest pocket and opened it under cover of the blanket; counting five words up from "thicket" he found "they"; five down from "knot" gave him "know"; six up from "youngster" was "you"; six down from "omniscient" was "one;" seven up from "issue" was "is;" and so continuing, he translated the words to:

Eaton, nervous and jerky, as he completed the first six words, laughed as he compiled the final three. "Leave train instantly!" The humor of that advice in his present situation, as he looked out the window at the solid bank of snow, appealed to him. A waiter from the dining car came back, announcing the first call for breakfast, and spurred him into action. Passengers from the Pullman at the rear passed Eaton's section for the diner. He heard Harriet Dorne's voice in some quiet conventional remark to the man who followed her. Eaton started at it; then he dressed swiftly and hurried into the now deserted washroom and then on to breakfast.

Harriet Dorne was sitting facing the door at the second of the larger tables; opposite her, and with his back to Eaton, sat Donald Avery. A third place was laid beside the girl, as though they expected Dorne to join them; but they had begun their fruit without waiting. The girl glanced up as Eaton halted in the doorway; her blue eyes brightened with a look part friendliness, part purpose. "Oh, Mr. Eaton," she smiled, "wouldn't you like to sit with us? I don't think Father is coming to breakfast now; and if he does, of course there's still room."

"Mr. Eaton," She Smiled, "Wouldn't You Like to Sit With Us?"

She pulled back the chair beside her enticingly; and Eaton accepted it.

"Good morning, Mr. Avery," he said to Miss Dorne's companion formally as he sat down, and the man across the table murmured something perforce.

As Eaton ordered his breakfast, he appreciated for the first time that his coming had interrupted a conversation—or rather a sort of monologue of complaint on the part of Standish addressed impersonally to Avery.

They engaged in conversation as they breakfasted—a conversation in which Avery took almost no part, though Miss Dorne tried openly to draw him in; then the sudden entrance of Connery, followed closely by a stout, brusque man who belonged to the rear Pullman, took Eaton's attention and hers.

Connery checked him, but pointed at the same time to Eaton.

"That's him, is it?" the other man said. "Then go ahead."

Eaton observed that Avery, who had turned in his seat, was watching this diversion on the part of the conductor with interest. Connery stopped beside Eaton's seat.

"You took a telegram for Lawrence Hillward this morning," he asserted.

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because it was mine, or meant for me, as I said at the time. My name is Eaton; but Mr. Hillward expected to make this trip with me."

The stout man with the conductor forced himself forward.

"What business is it of yours?" he demanded.

"What business? Why, only that I'm Lawrence Hillward—that's all, my friend! What are you up to, anyway? Lawrence Hillward traveling with you! I never set eyes on you until I saw you on this train; and you take my telegram!" The charge was made loudly and distinctly; every one in the dining car—Eaton could not see every one, but he knew it was so—had put down fork or cup or spoon and was staring at him. "What did you do it for? What did you want with it?" the stout man blared on. "Did you think I wasn't on the train? What?"

Eaton felt he was paling as he faced the blustering smaller man. He realized that the passengers he could see—those at the smaller tables—already had judged his explanation and found him wanting; the others unquestionably had done the same. Avery was gazing up at him with a sort of contented triumph.

"The telegram was for me, Conductor!" he repeated.

"Get that telegram, Conductor!" the stout man demanded again.

"I suppose," Connery suggested, "you have letters or a card or something, Mr. Eaton, to show your relationship to Lawrence Hillward."

"No, I have not."

Connery gazed from one claimant to the other. "Will you give this gentleman the telegram?" he asked Eaton.

"I will not."

"Then I shall furnish him another copy; it was received here on the train by our express clerk as the operator. I'll go forward and get him another copy."

"That's for you to decide," Eaton said; and as though the matter was closed for him, he resumed his seat. He was aware that, throughout the car the passengers were watching him curiously.

"Are you ready to go back to our car now, Harriet?" Avery inquired when she had finished her breakfast, though Eaton was not yet through.

"Surely there's no hurry about anything today," the girl returned. They waited until Eaton had finished.

"Shall we all go back to the observation car and see if there's a walk down the track or whether it's snowed over?" she said impartially to the two. They went through the Pullmans together.

The first Pullman contained four or five passengers; the next, in which Eaton had his berth, was still empty as they passed through. The next Pullman also, at first glance, seemed to have been deserted in favor of the diner forward or of the club-car farther back. The porter had made up all the berths there also, except one; but someone was still sleeping behind the curtains of Section Three, for a man's hand hung over the aisle. It was a gentleman's hand, with long, well-formed fingers, sensitive and at the same time strong. That was the berth of Harriet Dorne's father; Eaton was the last of the three to pass, and so the others did not notice his start; but so strong was the fascination of the hand in the aisle that he turned back and gazed at it before going on into the last car. Some eight or ten passengers—men and women—were lounging in the easy-chairs of the observation room; a couple, ulstered and fur-capped, were standing on the platform gazing back from the train.

The canyon through the snowdrifts, bored by the giant rotary plow the night before, was almost filled; drifts of snow eight or ten feet high and, in places, pointing still higher, came up to the rear of the train; the end of the platform itself was buried under three feet of snow; the men standing on the platform could barely look over the higher drifts.

"There's no way from the train in that direction now," Harriet Dorne lamented as she saw this. "What shall we do with ourselves?"

"Cribbage, Harriet? You and I?" Avery invited.

She shook her head. "If we have to play cards, get a fourth and make it auction; but must it be cards? Isn't there some way we can get out for a walk?"

"There's the top of the cars, Miss Dorne," Eaton suggested. "If we could get up these, we'd get a fairly decent walk and see everything."

"Good!" the girl applauded. "How do we get up?"

"I'll see the conductor about it," Eaton offered; and before Avery could discuss it, he started back through the train.

CHAPTER V

The Hand in the Aisle.

The man whose interest in the passenger in Section Three of the last sleeper was most definite and understandable and, therefore, most openly acute, was Conductor Connery. Connery had passed through the Pullman several times during the morning, had seen the hand which hung out into the aisle from between the curtains; but the only definite thought that came to him was that Dorne was a sound sleeper.

Nearly all the passengers had now breakfasted. Connery, therefore, took a seat in the diner, breakfasted leisurely and after finishing, walked back through the train. Dorne by now must be up, and might wish to see the conductor.

As Connery entered the last sleeper his gaze fell on the dial of pointers which, communicating with the push-buttons in the different berths, tell the porter which section is calling him, and he saw that while all the other arrows were pointing upward, the arrow marked "3" was pointing down. Dorne was up, then—for this was the arrow denoting his berth—or at least was awake and had recently rung his bell.

Connery looked in upon the porter, who was cleaning up the washroom.

"Section Three's getting up?" he asked.

"No, Mistah Connery—not yet," the porter answered.

"What did he ring for?" Connery looked to the dial, and the porter came out of the washroom and looked at it also.

"Fo' the lan's sake. I didn't hear no ring, Mistah Connery. It mus' have been when I was out on the platform."

"Answer it, then," Connery directed.

As the negro started to obey, Connery followed him into the open car. He could see over the negro's shoulder the hand sticking out into the aisle, and this time, at sight of it, Connery started violently. If Dorne had rung, he must have moved; a man who is awake does not let his hand hang out in the aisle. Yet the hand had not moved. The long, sensitive fingers fell in precisely the same position as before, stiffly separated a little one from another; they had not changed their position at all.

He dismissed the negro and waited until he had gone. He looked about and assured himself that the car, except for himself and the man lying behind the curtains of Section Three, was empty. Walking briskly as though he were carelessly passing up the aisle, he brushed hard against the hand and looked back, exclaiming an apology for his carelessness.

The hand fell back heavily, inertly, and resumed its former position and hung as white and lifeless as before. No response to the apology came from behind the curtains; the man in the berth had not roused. Connery rushed back to the curtains and touched the hand with his fingers. It was cold! He seized the hand and felt it all over; then, gasping, he parted the curtains and looked into the berth. He stared; his breath whistled out; his shoulders jerked, and he drew back, instinctively pressing his two clenched hands against his chest and the pocket which held President Jarvis' order.

The man in the berth was lying on his right side facing the aisle; the left side of his face was thus exposed; and it had been crushed in by a violent blow from some heavy weapon which, too blunt to cut the skin and bring blood, had fractured the cheekbone and bludgeoned the temple. The proof of murderous violence was so plain that the conductor, as he saw the face in the light, recoiled with staring eyes, white with horror.

He looked up and down the aisle to assure himself that no one had entered the car during his examination; then he carefully drew the curtains together again, and hurried to the forward end of the car, where he had left the porter.

"Lock the rear door of the car," he commanded. "Then come back here."

He gave the negro the keys, and himself waited to prevent anyone from entering the car at his end. Looking through the glass of the door, he saw the young man Eaton standing in the vestibule of the car next ahead. Connery hesitated; then he opened the door and beckoned Eaton to him.

"Will you go forward, please," he requested, "and see if there isn't a doctor—"

"You mean the man with red hair in my car?" Eaton inquired.

"That's the one."

Eaton started off without asking any questions. The porter, having locked the rear door of the car, returned and gave Connery back the keys. Connery still waited, until Eaton returned with the red-haired man. He let them in and locked the door behind them.

"You are a doctor?" Connery questioned the red-haired man.

"I am a surgeon; yes."

"That's what's wanted. Doctor—"

"My name is Sinclair. I am Douglas Sinclair of Chicago."

Connery nodded. "I have heard of you." He turned then to Eaton. "Do you know where the gentleman is who belongs to Mr. Dorne's party?—Avery, I believe his name is."

"He is in the observation car," Eaton answered.

"Will you go and get him? The car-door is locked. The porter will let you in and out. Something serious has happened here—to Mr. Dorne. Get Mr. Avery, if you can, without alarming Mr. Dorne's daughter."

Eaton nodded understanding and followed the porter, who, taking the keys again from the conductor, let him out at the rear door of the car and reclosed the door behind him. Eaton went on into the observation car.

Without alarming Harriet Dorne, he got Avery away and out of the car.

"Is it something wrong with Mr. Dorne?" Donald Avery demanded as Eaton drew back to let Avery precede him into the open part of the car.

"So the conductor says."

Avery hurried forward toward the berth where Connery was standing beside the surgeon. Connery turned toward him.

"I sent for you, sir, because you are the companion of the man who had this berth."

Avery pushed past him, and leaped forward as he looked past the surgeon. "What has happened to Mr. Dorne?"

"You see him as we found him, sir."

"You See Him as We Found Him, Sir."

Connery stared down nervously beside him.

Avery leaned inside the curtains and recoiled. "He's been murdered!"

"It looks so, Mr. Avery. Yes; if he's dead, he's certainly been murdered," Connery agreed. "You can tell"—Connery avoided mention of President Jarvis' name—"tell anyone who asks you, Mr. Avery, that you saw him just as he was found."

He looked down again at the form in the berth, and Avery's gaze followed his; then, abruptly, it turned away. Avery stood clinging to the curtain, his eyes darting from one to another of the three men.

"Will you start your examination now, Doctor Sinclair?" Connery suggested.

The surgeon, before examining the man in the berth more closely, lifted the shades from the windows. Everything about the berth was in place, undisturbed; except for the mark of the savage blow on the side of the man's head, there was no evidence of anything unusual. It was self-evident that, whatever had been the motives of the attack, robbery was not one; whoever had struck had done no more than reach in and deliver his murderous blow; then he had gone on.

Sinclair made first an examination of the head; completing this, he unbuttoned the pajamas upon the chest, loosened them at the waist and prepared to make his examination of the body.

"How long has he been dead?" Connery asked.

"He is not dead yet. Life is still present," Sinclair answered guardedly. "Whether he will live or ever regain consciousness is another question."

"One you can't answer?"

"The blow, as you can see"—Sinclair touched the man's face with his deft finger-tips—"fell mostly on the cheek and temple. The cheekbone is fractured. He is in a complete state of coma; and there may be some fracture of the skull. Of course, there is some concussion of the brain."

Any inference to be drawn from this as to the seriousness of the injuries was plainly beyond Connery. "How long ago was he struck?" he asked.

"Some hours. Since midnight, certainly; and longer ago than five o'clock this morning."

"Could he have revived half an hour ago—say within the hour—enough to have pressed the button and rung the bell from his berth?"

Sinclair straightened and gazed at the conductor curiously. "No, certainly not," he replied. "That is completely impossible. Why did you ask?"

Connery avoided answer. But Avery pushed forward. "What is that? What's that?" he demanded.

"Will you go on with your exami-

The recent experiments of the Townsan Bros. in listening to Dallas, Texas, with an inside aerial, induced ye editor to try it. We took the Battery-station Idependent set home Saturday evening and hooked it up to the window screen. A dozen different code stations were heard and one man talking. The latter, however, was not clear. We then hooked the set to a door-bell wire running around the room, and using the stove as a ground listened to the Ft. Hampton Team Shows Yellow In Game

GIRLS LOSE GAME 14 TO 9

The basket ball fans who attended the games last Friday night between Belmond and Hampton, certainly secured full value for their money—even tho they did not see two full games. Despite the severe cold, a large crowd was present. The first game, between the girls' teams of the two towns, was good, altho the Belmond girls were a little outclassed by the Hampton team and went down to defeat by a score of 14 to 9.

The boys' game was where the excitement began, and it was a whale! The game, taken from the beginning to the untimely end, was a beautiful study in colors. To begin with, the Belmond boys showed a speed that was dazzling, and the spectators grew black in the face trying to keep track of the ball. Hampton showed a delicate shade of greeness at the game compared to their opponents. This soon changed to a brighter green of envy which in turn went to white as defeat loomed large. The blue of a lost cause succeeded this, and was in turn replaced by the red of anger at the nerve of the small town hicks. The red gave way to the purple of rage, and the rainbow was then completed with a beautiful, yardwide and glaring shade of yellow, which finished the picture—and the crowd. Outclassed, outplayed, outwitted, his team fast headed for oblivion by the dazzling speed of the Belmond boys, the Hampton coach called his team from the floor after four minutes of play in the second half, and the score 12 to 4 for Belmond. Using a decision of the referee, Fred Ortmeyer of Garner, a disinterested and impartial referee, as an excuse, the coach quit cold while the crowd booed and yelled. A Hampton player, with three personal fouls, deliberately committed the fourth, which put him out of the game. It was the culmination of unnecessary and uncalled for rough play on the part of Hampton during the last half. Seeing certain defeat, they started the rough stuff, with the foregoing result. While it lasted, the game was a whirlwind, beyond question one of the best ever seen in Belmond. The superiority of Belmond was only too apparent. The school team here has a world of speed, head-work galore, while the guarding was almost unbeatable. Belmond had the ball fully four-fifths of the time. It is to be regretted that the game ended as it did, but the Hampton coach should be given full measure for his yellow tactics. It was some game!

DEATH CALLS MANY DURING PAST FEW DAYS

Mrs. W. W. Goetz, Mrs. S. P. Huntington, And Miss Nora Finn Are Called.

MRS W. W. GOETZ

Jessie Blake was born at Clayton, Iowa June 16, 1871 and died at her home in Belmond February, 1, 1923 after a lingering illness of several months.

She received her education in the school of her home town and afterward at the State Teachers College at Cedar Falls. After finishing her course at Cedar Falls she taught school for a number of years until her marriage to W. W. Goetz on June 28, 1905 since which time Belmond has been her home.

Mrs. Goetz was interested in all the affairs of the community and entered heartily into its business, social and religious activities. She was a Past Matron in the Eastern Star Lodge having served in all the offices of the lodge faithfully. She was a member of the Progress and Kensington clubs and did all that she could in the work of each.

In her girlhood she professed faith in Christ and joined the Methodist church and was active in its work. After moving to Belmond she became affiliated with the Congregational church and was a faithful member until death translated her to the membership on high. She served as president of the Missionary Society and was the efficient treasurer of the Ladies Aid society for a number of years.

Mrs. Goetz was a faithful wife and help meet to her husband, a kind neighbor and a loving friend. Besides the husband Mrs. Goetz leaves three brothers and three sisters besides other relatives and many friends who mourn her departure.

Funeral services were held at the Congregational church on Saturday afternoon and were in charge of the pastor, after which the body was laid to rest in our beautiful cemetary on the hill.

CARD OF THANKS

To the many friends who stood by us during the long illness and recent death of Mrs. Goetz, we wish to extend thanks. We appreciate the many favors, the kindly words of sympathy, the volume of flowers, and the whole hearted goodness of our community. The sublime last rites impressed us. Words fail to express our feelings at this time.

Very sincerely,

W. W. Goetz
The Blake Family.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express our very high appreciation of the innumerable acts of kindness so cheerfully accorded in the death of our beloved sister, Nora, as well as for the splendid spiritual and floral offerings. Your many acts of sympathy will long be remembered.

David Finn, Thomas Finn, William Finn, John Finn, James Finn, Miss Kate Finn, Mrs. Anna Courtney.

MRS S. P. HUNTINGTON

During her childhood she resided in various towns in Iowa, where her father was called. In 1872 she was married to Oscar I. Strong at Pocahontas, Iowa, where she resided until the death of her husband. Two children, Irene May and Rollin Webster, were born to this union, both of whom have passed away.

In 1889 she married Seth P. Huntington of Clarion, Iowa, to which union were born three children, Corrine, Seth, and Ruth. The family moved to Belmond in 1892. Mr. Huntington passing away in 1905. Mrs. Huntington took care of her family, gave them all an education, and assumed the full responsibilities of their growing lives until all three had married and were in their own homes. In 1922 she suffered a breakdown in health, and went to Vermillion to make her home with her daughter, Corrine. Last September she went to Dinsdale, Iowa, to stay with her son, Seth, returning January 25 apparantly in good health. That night she suffered a stroke, and on February 4 passed away.

SCHULTZ-ENGE

Father Eardly officiating. The ceremony took place at noon, and following a wedding dinner the couple left on a short wedding trip.

The bride is one of Belmond's best known young ladies, and has a host of friends who wish her happiness and prosperity in her new life. The groom is a prosperous young farmer of near Holmes, and will take his bride there this spring. The Independent joins in extending best wishes.

The little baby of Mr. and Mrs. Ned Packard, which has been quite ill with pneumonia, is reported much improved.

COW TESTING ASSC. ABOUT COMPLETED

Twenty-Three Of Necessary 26 Members Already Secured —Success Assured.

Prof. Spencer from the dairy department of the extension service of Ames, spent three days last week in the vicinity of Belmond assisting the county agent and dairy farmers of that community in organizing a cow testing association.

The Belmond Cow testing association has been in the process of organization for the last two months but now the association is about ready to function. Practically all of the necessary twenty-six members were signed up last week and the organization is about ready to act and the tester will begin work as soon as the members of the association get together and elect their officers and directors from their own membership.

As in the case with other testing associations of the state, the work will be carried on by an official cow tester who will spend one afternoon and night with each member of the association. Milk is taken from each cow both morning and evening and is weighed and tested for butter fat contents. The tester computes the monthly record of each cow on this daily record.

The Cow Testing association will be a decided advantage to the farmers of Belmond and the surrounding community because they will be able to locate the poor producing cows and at the same time have a definite record as to the amount of feed consumed by the animal and, in this way, be able to know the cost of production. The dairy production, today, is not so much a matter of increased production as it is a matter of the most economical production.

Friday night and Saturday was about the coldest weather we have had this winter, the mercury going down to 20 below, Saturday morning. A hard wind made it worse. But Iowa cannot complain of the weather this winter, at that.

Mrs. J. F. Howell of Rowan was a caller in town last Friday.

Elect Temporary Officers Thursday

MEET TONIGHT CITY HALL

The mass meeting called at the city hall last Thursday evening was attended by a fair sized crowd, but not as many as had been hoped for. Many farmers and business men who were known to favor a pavillion and who had promised to back it, were not present, feeling, no doubt, that they were not needed. This is a mistake, for if this pavillion for Belmond is to go thru, everyone must get behind and push it along.

The meeting was decidedly in favor a pavillion, and those present boosted hard. A temporary organization was formed, with Oscar Jenison as president, C. P. Luick vice president, Cato C. Griesy secretary, and H. F. Luick treausrer. After discussion, it was agreed that par value of shares should be $50, it being felt that this would enable more farmers to come into the organization than if $100 was made par.

Committees were then appointed to look after cites, and arrange for plans and specifications for the building, Cato C. Griesy, Cyril McGuire and John Dorenkamp being the cite committee, and H. F. Luick to look after plans, which he has taken up with the engineering department at Ames. Committees were then named to solicit the town and country, and sound out the sentiment regarding the pavillion among the people. These were:

Belmond town: A. L. Luick, C. O. Fitts; Belmond township: A. E. Martin; Pleasant township: J. F. Barry Norway township: Alvin Erickson; Grant township: E. G. Reed; Meservey; C. P. Luick; Goodell: Frank Quigley; Iowa township: P. Trees.

Another meeting will be held tonight, Thursday, at 8 o'clock, at the city hall at which time the project will be taken up further. The cites committee has some half a dozen locations in view on which they will report. It is expected that Mr. Luick will have the plans from Ames. It is earnestly desired that every farmer and business man interested—and every one should be—be at this meeting. Belmond needs a pavillion, and if the interested people will attend and boost, it will go thru. Do your bit—don't leave it all to a few. If you can't take a share, all well and good—that's your busniess and you know more about it than anyone else—but lend your moral support. Say you are for it. And let there be a larger representation of business men. This is a community project. Get behind it, gentlemen!

DEFENDANT FOUND—?

For the second time the Eagle Grove Times editor has declined the offer of this paper to settle the dispute between the Monitor and the Times. There will be no third attempt as we propose to lay our cards on the table and let the general public render the verdict. As far back as Sept. 1921, we called the Times' attention to the fact that court notes were being taken from the Monitor without proper credit being given to which the editor replied: "I regret very much that court items have been published in the Times without proper credit. Next time we use them will give proper credit." Fair enough. But the promise was soon broken and so were the exchange relations between the two papers. Then the Times editor sends us $2.00 with the resquest that we put him on our list. We declined. Some time later his assistant sent us a check for a subscription, which was returned with thanks. In the meantime the said editor borrowed the Monitor and continued the practice referred to. Then we set a trap for our esteemed contemporary by publishing phoney court cases, which had no fact or foundation. We purposely changed the figures in giving the amounts in several cases. Like a bullhead, the Times editor swallowed the bait, hook, line and sinker, and published these incorrect reports and now has the gall to say that we are accusing him falsely in face of the above letter over his own signature. The plaintiff rests. Come on in brother, the water is fine.—Monitor.

A deal was completed last Thursday whereby E. M. Lathrop purchased the pool and billiard parlors of Alex. Smith, located next to the old Adam Hollman lot, possession being taken at once. Dave Finn is managing the hall for Mr. Lathrop. Ed. recently sold his produce building to Geo. Heginger, and Ed. is too lively to take it easy so bought another business.

'TIS WELL FOR BELMOND

Says the Garner Leader—We had occasion to visit Belmond Monday evening and spent an hour or so in that splendid little city. We are going to give Belmond credit for being one of the live towns in this section of the state, but for the life of us, we cannot see what the town would ever have done were it not for the contributions that Garner has made to the business fraternity of that city. We found Wallace Ramsay in charge of their local mail dispensary and Fred Shipley, landlord of the principle hotel of that city. They were originally Garner boys. Well to the east end of Main street, we happened into the garage of the Belmond Motor Sales Company, and there we found N. E. Braer, another Garner young man, in charge. We gave this place a very thorough going over and found it to be a modern, up-to-date garage—one of the thriving, going institutions of Belmond, and "Nick" is the boy who makes it what it is. On the south side of the main thoroughfare, quite centrally located, we found a sign "Larson & Son, Meats, Groceries, Provisions." We stopped in and found our old Garner friend Mike Jacobson behind the block, dolled up in linen duster, looking cheerful, well fed and happy. On the "thumb hand side," in the manager's department, we located Northern Iowa's premier meat merchant, "Scoop" Larsen, another hustler who belongs to our town, whom Belmond has annexed. We were shown about this place of business by Mr. Larsen, and we are saying to our readers that we were actually bewildered. The entire sale and display room of this place, and it is spacious has genuine tile floor and magnificent fixtures. A built-in refrigerator about 20x24 feet, cooled by a modern ice machine, built-in smoke house and rendering tanks, stationary grinders, over-head steel track conveyers, those are a few of the modern improvements we found in the rear room. Positively, it is one of the best equiped, most modern miniature packing plants in the state of Iowa. "Scoop's" parents now reside in Belmond, and J. P., the senior member of the firm, delights in making the improvements the fastidious mind of his son, Oscar, suggests. The elder Mr. Larson is by trade a cabinet maker, and has built and installed many of the fixtures about the place. Do not visit Belmond without taking the time to drop into the places we have mentioned, and see for yourself what Garner men are doing for that town. We are giving Belmond a lot of credit. When they steal one of our men, they pick a good one.

MARTHA JANE MORSE-CUTLER

As briefly mentioned last week funeral services for the late Mrs. G. L. Cutler occurred at the home of her daughter, Mrs. E. R. Lockwood, after which the remains were taken by auto to Belmond for interment in the family lot.

Martha Jane Morse was born in Michigan nearly seventy-eight years ago, being one of eleven children of Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Morse. The Morse family came to Wright county in 1866 and located on a 400-acre tract of land near Belmond. At that time this entire country was a vast expanse of prairie land, the early settlers finding homes along the rivers, where fuel was gathered from the timber and fish taken from the streams. Common to others of the pioneer settlers Mrs. Cutler experienced much of frontier life. In August 1868, Martha Morse was united in mariage with George L. Cutler, also a pioneer settler. For a score of years they continued to reside at Belmond, when an official appointment for Mr. Cutler occasioned their removal to the county seat at Clarion in 1887, where he filled the position of county recorder for several years. For more than thirty-five years this city has been their home and during that time the Cutler family became one of the best known among our residents. Mrs. Cutler had a strong personality and was greatly admired by her friends and acquaintances for her many excellent traits of character. Her devotion as wife and mother could not be excelled.

The immediate relatives surviving are: Mrs. E. R. Lockwood of this city, also two brothers and one sister, R. C. and W. J. Morse of Belmond and Mrs. E. S. Hubbard of Durango, Colo. Those from a distance attending the funeral services were Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Devine of Indianola and Miss Mildred Lockwood of Des Moines.—Monitor.

SOCIETY

Banquet—

Last week, Wednesday evening, the Odd Fellows gave a banquet for the Rebekahs in the Odd Fellow hall. Over a hundred members and guests were present to enjoy the banquet and the splendid program given afterwards.

Much credit is due the committee in charge of which Wm. Hembd was the chairman for the success of the evening. Everyone declared it the best time ever held in the Odd Fellows Hall.

The supper was very neatly and nicely served by the men, and greatly enjoyed by all.

On the program were several selections by the male quartette: Wm. Nelson, Harry Nordscow, W. T. Gfeller, Wm. Trafford, accompanied on the piano by Thayne Bailey.

Some very good readings by Mrs. McBurney, Bernitas Wolle, Kathrine Barry, and Esther Dibble. Also a vocal solo by Esther Dibble accompanied by Mrs. Dr. Brown.

Rev. Van Meter who was present was asked to sing, which he did after telling a story and making the quartette line up back of him to help him out, they sang "That Old Goat was too Wise to Die." While everybody roared with laughter. Rev. Van Meter also led the singing of a few war songs and told a few of his experiencies while in the war. To some of the Odd Fellows it seemed like old times to have Rev. Van Meter with them with his jolly, wholesome humor.

Next T. N. Davenport was asked to "sing a little song." This he did and was called back twice, while the audience laughed as they had not laughed for many a day.

HERE AND THERE

Mr. and Mrs. Earl Martin, Mrs. Matt Barry and the Misses Mae Tracy and Maru Barry, all of Belmond, spent Thursday last at the C. E. Barnes home, visiting Mrs. Rosecrans who has been ill.—Garner Leader.

One little step won't take you far,
You've got to keep on walking;
One little word won't tell it all,
You've got to keep on talking.
One little inch won't make you tall;
You've got to keep on growing,
One little ad won't do it all,
You've got to keep them going.

Mrs. LuVerne Smith was at Belmond one day this week.—Times.

The Hampton high school building was broken into some time after 10:00 o'clock last Monday night and the building was ransackd from top to bottom.

The theives got away with some change, a gold ring and a Remington portable typewriter from the commercial rooms and a leather traveling bag belonging to Wayne Ferris from the locker room. No other losses have been discovered by the school authorities.

Entrance to the building was made thru a window in the domestic science rooms on the west side of the first floor.—Chronicle.

Mrs. W. I. Rosecrans went to the hospital at Rochester, Minnestota, Monday, where she expects to be operated upon. She was accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. C. E. Barnes and her niece, Miss Catherine Pritchard. Miss Pritchard is a trained nurse, and has been with her aunt practically all the time during her last sick spell which dates from around the first of the year. Mrs. Rosecrans' many Garner friends hope that she will return from the hospital entirely cured of the trouble which has caused her much pain and suffering for the month past.—Garner Leader.

Mr. and Mrs. Schlichting of Belmond were in Klemme Friday buying furniture of Wellemeyer.—Times.

Two men giving the names of B. Ayers and James Peterson, were arrested the last of the week for shooting prairie chickens on the Grimm farm, which is near the county line and about three miles north of the Pike. A young man who lives on the place heard a shot and saw a big flock of chickens fly away from the vicinity where the men were. He saw them pick up something and put in their car, so he testified in court. He took the number of their car, and from the number, had them arrested. They claimed that they had been over in Floyd county that day, but Justice Herb Reed thought differently from the evidence and assessed them $25 and costs amounting to $10.70 which they paid.—Garner Signal.

We read in one of our exchanges this week that people used to keep their "family skeletons" locked in the home closet, but judging from the present day daily newspapers, they get them all and expose them to the gaping public. This is not saying that the country editor could not do the samething, as the average country printshop has a good supply of "skeletons" on hand most of the time.—Kanawha Reporter.

HOSPITAL SERVICE DOUBLE SINCE 1920

Hospital service for state cases at the University of Iowa has more than doubled since 1920, according to figures just released by President W. A. Jessup. For the year ending July 1, 1920, the total number of state cases was 2,884, while for the half year ending December 31 1922 the total is 2,995, making an estimated total for the current year of about 6,000 cases. As a result the hospital facilities are crowded beyond the limit, and hundreds of persons are on the waiting list.

Service Fostered by Legislature

This service began in 1915 when the Thirty-sixth general assembly enacted the Perkins Law providing hospital and medical care for indigent children. The thirty-seventh General Assembly appropriated funds for the construction of a Children's Hospital, and the Thirty-eight General Assembly enacted the Haskell-Klaus Act extending the same provisions to indigent adults. The latter two acts were passed without a single dissenting vote.

Demands for hospital care at the University has now completely outgrown the accommodations available and a new hospital is regarded as imperative. Forty patients are quartered in dwelling houses and fifty in a wooden shack, with the attendant fire hazards.

Patients from 86 counties Waiting.

On January 15 more than 400 cases from 86 counties of the state were waiting their turn to get in. Some of these patients are in desperate straits and need instant attention.

Year ending July 1, 1920 2284
Year ending July 1, 1921.....3394
Year ending July 1, 1922.....4917
Half year ending Dec. 31, 1922..2995

Construction of the new hospital would be a real economy, President Jessup is convinced. It will release the old hospital for conversion into dormitories which are greatly needed. Class-rooms, for which church parlors, store rooms, and temporary wooden buildings are now employed, can be made of other buildings to be superseded by the new medical structures.

The grand two-day opening of the Belmond Furniture Co. last Friday and Saturday, was a huge success, and scores of visitors, both men and women, were entertained and shown thru the store. Cocoa and wafers were served and the ladies presented with a carnation. It is understood that the company plans to make this an annual event.

A MONTH GONE MIGHTY LITTLE DONE

(By G. L. Caswell)

Des Moines, Feb. 8, 1923.

This General Assembly has now been going along for a month, but the results of its work are not greatly to its credit, it must be admitted. Revising the Code of Iowa, which was the paramount issue when the session convened, has dwindled into an incident. The House has passed but few Code revision bills and the Senate ended the month of January with less than half a dozen, though by resolution that body voted to give Code revision bills precedence over all others until February 1st. Whether Governor Kendall will regard this as an earnest attempt to complete the revision work or not is a question. He is supposed to call a special session later, provided this regular session finds it cannot do the work within a reaonable time. At any rate, it is now very evident that if the Code is revised by this General Assembly it will have to be at a special session, regardless of cost or economy.

Taxation Commission Reports.

Report of the special state tax commission, members of which were appointed two years ago by action of the 39th General Assembly, was filed in both House and Senate Tuesday morning last week. Since that time there has been more or less serious talk about it, with some scoffing, some doubt, some hope and little confidence that very much along the lines suggested will be taken by this General Assembly.

The special tax commission consists of ten members, and this commission has met in Des Moines and has put in something over sixty days' time, off and on, studing taxation matters and trying to improve Iowa's taxation system as a whole.

Recommendations of this tax commission include five main features, as follows: first, abolishment of all local or town and township assessors and creation of a state board of assessment in place of the present board composed of the members of the executive council; a county assessor to be named by the chairman of the board of supervisors and county officers. Second, a state budget board to determine the amount of money to be appropriated for each department. Third, district budget boards. Fourth, a 10 per cent tax on all amusement tickets for the benefit of the school funds. Fifth, one cent per gallon tax on all gasoline sold at retail within this state, money from which shall go to the improvement of the secondary roads and the abolishment of the present two-mill road tax.

Details for carrying out all of these recommendations are suggested in the report, which is a voluminous one, covering 150 typewritten pages. Valuation of all property for assessment at full value instead of one-fourth will raise some serious quetion, but the committee explains that their administration bill provides that in no case shall the future tax levies raise more money on this account than is raised by the present system of scaling.

Rumors that this tax committee would favor the abolition of the present system of township assessors and local boards of review have been floating about over the state for some time, and as a result many members of both houses have received petitions from constituents protesting against any such change. They have had the present system so long and it has been bent to suit their ideas of taxation to that extent they do not want a change. The belief is that no final action on the commission's report or the special bills it has presented to carry out its recommendations will be taken during this regular session—and if it all goes over to the special session with Code revision there will not be time to handle so important a matter! And there you are—E pluribus unum.

Highway Commission a Target.

Iowa's good roads program and even the life of the State Highway Commission may be snuffed out by this General Assembly, from present indications. The first test vote along this line came on Wednesday, both in House and Senate.

The House passed the Fackler bill by a vote of 90 to 5, which provides that the primary road system money may be used for "any other purpose" in addition to that specified by the Federal aid act to secure Iowa's apportionment of government funds for highway purposes. At the same time the bill as amended leaves the Highway Commission and county supervisors without restraint in the use of the primary road money for "the establishment, construction and maintenance of the primary road system, including the drainage, grading, surfacing, construction of bridges and culverts, the elimination or improvement of railway crossings the purchase of additional right-of-way or for any other purpose connected with the establishment, construction and maintenance of the primary road system."

The House acted favorably on the bill by Patterson of Kossuth county, relating to elections authorizing the hard surfacing of roads, by providing that not less than two years after a vote has been declared to favor the hard surfacing of primary roads, the same voters may order another election to vote on the discontinuance of hard surfacing. The need for this law is said to have been demonstrated in certain parts of the state where voters have favored hard surfacing of roads only to see the matter delayed for several years and then put through without any chance to change the program.

The Senate attack on the Highway Commission came by way of a resolution introduced by McIntosh of Decatur, requiring that the Highway Commission furnish a complete invoice of all materials of every kind sent to it by the government with an approximate valuation of the different articles received and its approximate original cost; the amount of freight paid on same, and out of what funds payment was made, together with a statment of the amount of ground leased by the Commission, term of leases, etc, and the total cost of such buildings as have been erected to house such materials. An amendment by Buser was adopted requiring also the authority under which such property was received and paid for.

Friends of the Highway Commission fought against the passage of this resolution, and on one point raised a test vote indicated an exact tie—24 to 24. Friends of the Commission declared the Commission would furnish all information wanted without the resolution, but that a complete invoice as required would take weeks to prepare. On adoption of the amended resolution, however, they generally voted for the resolution.

Senator Holdoegel of Calhoun county chairman of the highways committee, offered the information that Iowa is now paying in to the Federal government $2,400,000, per year and is getting back in road fund money approximately $8,000,000, which funds, he states, will be jeopardized if this state refuses to comply with the terms of the Federal aid act.

More Important Bills Pending

As stated last week, the fact that certain bills are introduced need not excite the people greatly as most of such bills will be killed on the way though the legislative mill. However as indicating the trend of the legislative mind in these days, we may cite the purport of a few of the bills offered up to the middle of last week:

In the Senate:

S. F. 264 byMcIntosh—A bill to remove the maximum number of voters as prescribed where double election boards may be used giving such double election boards to all precincts.

S. F. 266 by Bowman—A bill giving to cities and towns the right to regulate telephone rates and charge for service.

S. F 267 by Tuck—A bill giving to boards of supervisors "plenary jurisdiction subject to the approval of the council to grade, drain, gravel or hard sufacing any road or street which is a continuance of the primary road system of the county within any town," or within any city.

S. F. 268 by Bowman—Companion to House File 268 by Fackler relating to primary roads, as passed by the House January 31.

S. F. 269 by Snook—Prohibiting public employees from receiving any other compensation from the public treasury for additional services.

S. F. 270 by Buser—A bill relating to exemption from taxation of municipal, school and drainage bonds.

S. F. 272 by Ethell—A bill relating to the organization of school boards, meetings of directors, election of officers, reports of secretaries and treasurers to the board, extension of terms in certain districts, etc.

S. F. 274 by Tuck—A bill making it unlawful for any country, township, school district, city or town to issue bonds without first submitting the proposition to issue such bonds to a vote of the people.

S. F. 273 by Caldwell—Providing a tax of two cents per gallon on gasoline to provide funds for paving numerous highways across the state.

S. F. 287 by Johnston—A bill relating to the incurring of debt and the issuance of bonds of the county by the board of supervisors and providing for an election. Limiting indebtedness of any county to $5,000 without authority of the voters.

S. F. 292 by Nelson—A bill relating to straightening of creeks and rivers.

S. F. 294 by Johnston—A bill relating to the appropriation of funds of the county to farm improvement associations, etc. Calculated to require an election and a majority of the voters favoring such appropriation before the board can make such appropriation as now goes to Farm Bureau organizations.

S. F. 298 by McIntosh—Changing the time for holding primary elections from June to August.

S. F. 303 by Snook—Providing penitentiary sentence for any person convicted of operating a motor vehicle upon public highways while in an intoxicated condition, and providing for confiscation of such vehicle.

S. F. 306 by Buser—Prohibiting use of decoys in hunting ducks. Also S. F. 307, limiting the number of ducks that may be bagged by a hunter in one day to ten.

S. F. 309 by Buser—Providing that the county treasurer shall, on or before the 15th day of each month, prepare sworn statements of the amount of money in his hands on the last day of the preceding month belonging to the state treasury, and requiring the state treasurer to draw on such funds whenever the state balance shall get below one million dollars. Until such balance is below one million all funds to remain in county treasury.

S. F. 311 by White—Relating to the funding or refunding of indebtness in counties by the issuance of bonds.

S. F. 349 by Thruston—Providing for an insurance rating bureau in this state and for rate regulation.

S. F. 323 by Abben—A bill providing for continuance of salaries now paid to county officers until July 4th, 1925.

Numerous House files are also on record, report of which will be made in another letter. At the present time all committees in both House and Senate are busy considering proposed legislation in their hands, but the calendars do not show very many bills recommended for passage. Code commission bills are receiving very little favorable consideration in either body.

Factional differences in both House and Senate, with suspicions, distrust, envy, and even hatred, are apparent to all observers among the solons. The state can look for very little constructive accomplishment with such a condition existing.

The Soldiers' Bonus.

Consideration of the legality of the soldiers' bonus law and issue of bonds to pay the soldiers of the world war by the state supreme court is set to begin February 13th. There seems to be a general feeling that the court will uphold the law as voted upon by the voters at last election and the issue of bonds contemplated as valid, in which case the bonds are all ready for sale and payments ready to be made to the soldiers as soon as the bond money comes into the hands of the state treasurer.

WHEN IT'S THE OTHER FELLOW

Have you ever noticed? When the other fellow acts that way, he is ill-tempered;" when you do it, it's "nerves". When the other fellow is set in his ways, he's "obstinate;" when you are, it is just "firmness."

When the other fellow doesn't like your friends, he's "prejudged;" when you don't like his, you are simply showing that you are a good judge of human nature.

When the other fellow tries to treat some one especially well, he is "toadying;" when you try the same tactic, you are using "tact."

When the other fellow takes time to do things, he is 'dead slow;" when you do it, you are "deliberate."

When the other fellow spends a lot he is a 'spendthrift;' when you do, you are "generous."

When the other fellow holds too tight to his money, he is "close;" when you do, you are "prudent."

When the other fellow dresses extra well, he's a "dandy;" when you do, it is simply "a duty one owes to society.

When the other fellow runs great risks in business, he is "foolhardy;" when you do, you are a "great financier."

When the other fellow says what he thinks, he is spiteful;" when you do, you are "frank".—Empire State Sunday School Leader.

INCOME TAX FACTS.

Revenue officers are visiting every county in the United States to aid taxpayers in the preparation of their income tax returns for the year 1922. Information concerning the date of their arrival and the location of their offices may be obtained by writing the collector of internal revenue for the district in which the taxpayer lives.

Forms for filing returns of individual net income for the year 1922 are being sent to taxpayers who filed returns for the year 1921. Failure to receive a form, however, does not relieve the taxpayer of his obligation to file a return and pay the tax on time, on or before March 15, 1923. The forms, 1040A for filing returns of net income $5,000 and less 1040 for filing returns of net income in excess of $5,000, may be obtained from collectors of internal revenue and deputy collectors.

Returns are required of every single person whose net income for 1922 was $1,000 or more or whose gross income was $5,000 or more and of every married person whose net income was $2,000 or more or whose gross income was $5,000 or more. Careful study of the instructions on the forms will greatly aid in making a correct return.

RYDER CASE DROPPED

Legal action brought against R. E. Ryder to have him placed under bonds to preserve the peace, was dismissed this morning by Justice D. W. VanAntwrep on motion of Prosecuting Attorney Asa K. Hayden. Ryder was represented in court by Attorney Coy Hendryx.

Suit was filed by Attorney James Kinnane on behalf of Ryder's wife Miss Gladys Toyne, who has asumed her maiden name and is teaching school at Eau Claire. The wife accused Ryder of threatening her and attempting to coerce her into returning to Iowa with him.

Both parties were questioned by Prosecutor Hayden who declared that no case existed against Ryder.

The man came here from Rowan Ia., and was said to have been annoying his wife. It was said that the wife has come to Michigan where she will establish a residence and secure a divorce from Ryder.

It was expected that Ryder would return to his Iowa home today without consulting his wife further.

Junior Livestock Judging at Woolstock.

A junior livestock judging contest is being planned in connection with the Woolstock short course which is scheduled for February 15 and 16. This junior judging contest will be open to all boys and girls of Wright and Hamilton counties, between the ages to ten and eighteen years inclusive, taking January 1st, 1923 as the date from which ages will be considered. All contestants in the judging contest will be required to judge one class each of horses, cattle hogs, and corn and will be required to give placings and written reasons on each class. Awards will be made to the boys and girls on the basis of fifty per cent for placings and fifty per cent for reasons, making 400 a perfect score in the contest. Prizes of $5 for first, $3 for second and $2 for third, have been arranged for by the committee for this junior live stock judging work.

Care In Selecting Dairy Cattle

Considerable interest has developed throughout the state of Iowa, and particularly in Wright county, during the past year in the dairy industry and as a result many dairy cattle have been imported into our county.

Too much care cannot be exercised in the selection of the dairy cattle which may be brought into any community. Since there is such a strong demand for dairy animals in our community, every effort should be made to guard against the shipment of inferior grade livestock of dairy type or otherwise unless something quite definite is known about the source of these individuals, also something about their milk records.

It would seem that in order for any farmer to buy good quality of dairy cattle, he should go to communities where the stuff is produced and select his cows on their individual milk records. The farmer who is not experienced in the dairy work and who is not a judge of dairy cattle, and who wishes to buy, should investigate thoroughly the source of the dairy cattle which he purchases. Reliable information can be had regarding the places where stock is for sale, and there is no good excuse why any farmer should buy an inferior grade of dairy animals when so many high quality, high grade animals are being offered for sale in dairy communities.

Poultry Association Elects Officers

At a meeting of the Wright County Poultry association which was held at the county agent's office January 30, directors were elected to direct the affairs of the association for the coming year.

President A. R. Thorpe was in charge of the meeting and plans for the work of the organization for the coming year were discussed. A committee was appointed to draft a constitution and by-laws for the organization to be submitted for adoption at the next regular meeting of the association which will be held during the first week in April at the county agent's office. The date of this meeting will be announced later by President Thorpe.

Poultry fanciers from all parts of the county were in attendance at this meeting and representatives from the various parts of the county were appointed as directors on the board of directors of the organization. An effort was made to have one representative from each town of the county in order that the poultry association may be developed in all parts of the county.

The officers and directors who will direct the affairs of the association for the year 1923, are as follows:

Officers: President, A. R. Thorpe Clarion; Vice-Pres. Carl Dahlgren, Clarion; Sec-Treas., E. R. Ballou, Rowan.

Big Short Course at Woolstock

The Woolstock Community Short Course which is being planned promises to be one of the liveliest community affairs which has ever been held in that section of Wright county. The various committees have been appointed and are now working unceasingly in an effort to hold a successful short course.

Considerable interest seems to have been created in the livestock department and breeders from both Wright and Hamilton counties have promised to bring out good exhibits in this department. Since the principal productions of Wright county are corn and hogs, there will no doubt, be a good showing in the corn and small grain exhibits. The poultry fanciers of the county are beginning to take interest in the plans which are being made for the poultry show to be held in connection with this short course.

Miss Rose Johnson, superintendent of the Woolstock schools, is chairman of the committee in charge of the ladies' department of the short course and it is hoped that the ladies of Woolstock and the surrounding community will bring out their exhibits to make this part of the show interesting, also to have the advantage of hearing Miss Elizabeth Storms, home demonstration agent, from Fort Dodge, who is to judge the exhibits and lecture in this department.

Plans have been completed and committees appointed and everyone seems to be working faithfully for a successful short course at Woolstock. The members of the various committee to plan and organize the Woolstock short course are as follows:

Livestock:—Frank Zenor, hogs; J. B. Carpenter beef cattle; H. O. Evans, horses; Victor Claude, dairy cattle.

Grain and Vegetables:—E. G. Caquelin, chairman, John Loux, Anthony Rapp, Louis Haack.

Domestic Science:—Miss Rose Johnson, chairman, Mrs. Matt Adams, Mrs. Louis Haack.

Landscape Architect Addresses Belmond Ladies.

Prof. H. H. Cornell, extension professor of landscape architecture, made a very interesting address to the ladies of the Belmond Community Welfare club at their last regular meeting which was held in the Belmond public library on January 19.

Mr. Cornell has the following to say about the transplanting of trees in winter:

"A home is more liveable with a tree beside it. Homes and schools everywhere appear bare and fobidding for lack of a little planting about them. A few trees carefully placed, will add more to the grounds than will many shrubs and flowers. But tree growth is slow. It is disheatening to wait for the baby tree to pread its branches and really become useful. Nor does it help much to favor the rapid growing varieties, for the older they grow the more trouble they give. With winter tree transplanting the long wait is concelled and a tree well towards maturity may be induced to leave the neighboring woods and come to your very doorstep—its coolness and shadow realized the very same year it is planted.

"Winter transplanting of large trees is not a difficult process. It is easier, usually much cheaper and less risky to dig up and move a frozen ball of earth containing the roots of a tree than it is to carefully transplant those same roots during the spring or summer, disturbing them by such handling, exposing them to dry weather and returning them to the ground in cramped and unnatural positions. The roots contained in the frozen ball of earth will never know they have been moved. In winter, too, the tree is dormant, and those roots actually injured will have time to partly recover before the demand for food must begin in the spring. Another advantage—in the winter there is more time to devote to such work.

GET THIEF AT HAMPTON

Raymond W. Woodson was arrested last Thursday afternoon by Sheriff Atkinson and arraigned before Justice of Peace D. W. Parks last Friday for a preliminary hearing on the charge of larceny. Woodson is charged with the theft of automobile tires from the Farmers Elevator Company at Geneva.

The roobery occurred July 8, 1921 and no trace of the thieves were found at that time, but the officers have been on the lookout for any clue and a short time ago they located a tire at Dows which was the same make and which had the same serial number as one of the tires stolen at Geneva. The discovery was made by County Supervisor Andrew Erickson. The man who was using the tire, Maynard Wedekin is an employee of D. L. Cuppett, manager of the Cuppett Auto Company at Dows. Wedekin said that he purchased the tire along with another one like it from his employer. Cuppett told of the circumstances under which he had made the purchase of the tires and described the man from whom he had bought them. He later identified Woodson as the man who sold him the tires and his identification was substantiated by Wedekin. Cuppett said that Woodson came over to Dows and sold the tires claiming that his brother was in the tire business and had overbought.

Cuppett said that he bought fifteen tires from Woodson for $200 and that he paid $80 down and the remainder in two installments, which Woodson came to Dows and collected.

Woodson denied that he had any part in the theft of the tires at Geneva and he also denied that he sold any tires to Cuppett or to anyone else. "This whole business is a frameup against me," Woodson declared.

Outside of his denial of his guilt and his declaration that the whole affair was a frameup, Woodson made no statement.

Judge Parks, after reviewing the evidence, bound Woodson over to the February grand jury and fixed his bond at $1.000. Woodson has been unable to raise the amount of his bond up to date and is awaiting trial in the county jail.—Chronicle.

His Point of View

"Who can tell me a thing of importance that did not exist a hundred years ago?" asked the new teacher.

"Me," piped the small boy in the class.

A VERY STRANGE CASE

"The Lord gave my daughter a crippled leg. If he had wanted her to have a good one, He would have given it to her." That was the argument Miss Lone Trott met in the course of her duties as Webster county nurse at Ft. Dodge, according to her report just received by Miss Ann Drake, director of nursing, Iowa Tuberculosis association. The nurse was "stumped." She consulted a minister for some scriptural references. But the woman believed in her own interpretation and was adamant. Miss Trott kept up her visits, saw that the child had enough to eat, took her to movies and in the end convinced the mother to take the child to the Perkins hospital in Iowa City. The mother remained in Iowa City to work so she could be with the child. The child was relieved in a large measure of her impediment and Miss Trott has received the thanks of the erstwhile obdurate mother.—Exchange.

WILL BURY NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Nortz of Devil's Lake, North Dakota, were calling on old Corwith friends and former neighbors the latter part of last week and the first of this. They were both raised in Corwith and have a host of friends here. Mr. Nortz has been engaged in the lumber business since leaving here and he and his brothers have a line of yards in Minnesota and North Dakota. They have prospered nicely. He says that money has been and is still tight in their territory but that collections are not being forced beyond the debtor's ability to pay and as things are moving now settlements can be made without many foreclosures. Mr. Nortz thinks by the time the next election rolls around they will be able to bury the Non-partisan league and then North Dakota will again be on the road to prosperity.—Corwith Hustler.

JUDGE SAYS IT'S WRONG

Judge Wade, in the Federal court imposed a fine of $1,000 each on William H. The lottery purported to have the backing of the American Legion at Perry. Soon after the close of the war, there was a prefect mania in conducting "raffles" and it took a forceful appeal from the attorney general to convince people of the unlawful procedure.—Ex.

CLARION ANTICIPATING PAVING IMPROVEMENT

Clarion's paving program is taking on definite shape and if plans are carried out as outlined over four miles of paved streets will be added to our city this season, making the total practically five miles. Never in the history of the town has a single understaking been launched that meant so much for the future of our city as the present paving project. Another commendable feature of our city is the fact that with few exceptions it is being boosted by all classes of citizens. At present sixty-seven blocks are in the program, some of which may be dropped and others added. The width of practically all residence streets is twenty-four feet. The estimated cost of a 66-foot lot for concrete paving is $325, while the better grades will come as high as $400 per lot. A map showing the tentative outline of the proposed paving will be found on this page.—Monitor.

FRANKLIN COUNTY SELLS BONDS AT GOOD PREMIUM

The Franklin county board of supervisors sold $45,000 worth of funding bonds last Friday to Whitte-Phillips Company, of Davenport, at four and one-half per cent interest and secured a premium of $126. The bonds were advertised to be sold at five per cent, but the bidding was so lively and the board called off the meeting, and opening up with another contest selling at four and one-half per cent.

The saving to the county over the original proposition is considerable in the amount of interest it would be necessary to pay: The amount would run close to $2,300, and in this age of high taxes and high cost of living this will buy a lot of things. The bonds were to run for ten years.

The total bonded indebtedness of Franklin county is now just about $435,0000 mostly all for road purposes.—Hampton Chronicle.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved.

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

He felt suddenly a rough tap upon his shoulder, and turning, saw that Donald Avery had come out upon the platform and was standing beside him; and behind Avery he saw Conductor Connery. There was no one else on the platform.

"Will you tell me, Mr. Eaton—or whatever else your name may be—what it is that you have been asking Miss Santoine?" Avery demanded harshly. "Harry, what has this man been saying to you?"

"Mr. Eaton?" Her gaze went wonderingly from Avery to Eaton and back again. "Why—why, Don! He has only been asking me what we had found out about the attack on Father!"

"And you told him?" Avery swung toward Eaton. "You dog!" he mouthed. "Harriet, he asked you that because he needed to know—he had to know! Harry, this is the man that did it!"

Eaton's fists clenched; but suddenly, recollecting, he checked himself. Harriet, not yet comprehending, stood staring at the two; then Eaton saw the blood rush to her face and dye forehead and cheek and neck as she understood.

"Not here, Mr. Avery; not here!" Conductor Connery put his hand on Eaton's arm. "Come with me, sir," he commanded.

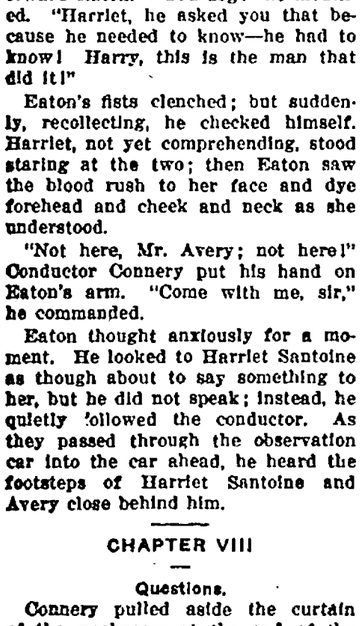
Eaton thought anxiously for a moment. He looked to Harriet Santoine as though about to say something to her, but he did not speak; instead, he quietly followed the conductor. As they passed through the observation car into the car ahead, he heard the footsteps of Harriet Santoine and Avery close behind him.

CHAPTER VIII

Questions.

Connery pulled aside the curtain of the washroom at the end of the Santoine car—the end farthest from the drawing room where Santoine lay.

"Step in here, sir," he directed. "Sit down, if you want. We're far enough



"Step In Here, Sir," He Directed.

Eaton, seating himself in the corner of the leather seat built against two walls of the room, and looking up, saw that Avery had come into the room with them. The girl followed. With her entrance into the room came to him a strange sensation which exhausted his breath and stopped his pulse for a beat. To be accused—even to be suspected—of the crime against Santoine was to have attention brought to him which—with his unsatisfactory account of himself—threatened ugly complications. Yet, at this moment of realization, that did not fill his mind. Whether his long dwelling close to death had numbed him to his own danger, however much more immediate it had become, he could not know; probably he had prepared himself so thoroughly, had inured himself so to expect arrest and imminent destruction, that now his finding himself confronted with accusers in itself failed to stir new sensation; but till this day, he had never imagined or been able to prepare himself for accusation before one like Harriet Santoine; so, for a moment, thought solely of himself was a subcurrent. Of his conscious feelings, the terror that she would be brought to believe with the others that he had struck the blow against her father was the most poignant.

"Why did you ring the bell in Mr. Santoine's berth?" Avery directed the attack upon him suddenly.

"To call help," Eaton answered.

"You had known, then, that he needed help?"

"I knew it—saw it then, of course."

"When?"

"When I found him. When I went forward to look for the conductor to ask him about taking a walk on the roof of the cars."

"You found him then—that way, the way he was?"

"That way? Yes."

"How?"

"How?" Eaton iterated.

"Yes; how, Mr. Eaton, or Hillward, or whatever your name is? How did you find him? The curtains were open, perhaps; you saw him as you went by, eh?"

Eaton shook his head. "No; the curtains weren't open; they were closed."

"Then why did you look in?"

"I saw his hand in the aisle."

"Go on."

"When I came back it didn't look right to me; its position had not been changed at all, and it hadn't looked right to me before. So I stopped and touched it, and I found that it was cold."

"Then you looked into the berth?"

"Yes."

"And having looked in and seen Mr. Santoine injured and lying as he was, you did not call anyone, you did not bring help—you merely leaned across him and pushed the bell and went on quickly out of the car before anyone could see you?"

"Yes; but I waited on the platform of the next car to see that help did come; and the conductor passed me, and I knew that he and the porter must find Mr. Santoine, as they did."

"Do you expect us to believe that very peculiar action of yours was the act of an innocent man?"

"If I had been guilty of the attack on Mr. Santoine, I'd not have stopped or looked into the berth at all."

"If you are innocent, you had, of course, some reason for acting as you did. Will you explain what it was?"

"No—I cannot explain."

With a look of triumph Avery turned to Harriet Santoine, and Eaton felt his flesh grow warm with gratitude as he saw her meet Avery's look with no appearance of being convinced.

Avery made a vexed gesture, and turned to Connery. "Tell her the rest of it," he directed.

Connery, who had remained standing back of the two chairs, moved slightly forward. "Where shall I begin?" he asked of Avery; he was looking not at the girl but at Eaton.

"At the beginning," Avery directed.

"Mr. Eaton, when you came to this train, the gateman at Seattle called my attention to you," Connery began. "Old Sammy has recognized men with criminal records time and again. He's got seven rewards out of it."

Eaton felt his pulses close with a shock. "He recognized me?" he asked quietly.

"No, he didn't; he couldn't place you," Connery granted. "He couldn't tell whether you were somebody that was 'wanted' or someone well known—someone famous, maybe; but I ought to have kept my eye on you because of that, from the very start. Now, this morning you claim a telegram meant for another man—a man named Hillward, on this train, who seems to be all right—that is, by his answers and his account of himself he seems to be exactly what he claims to be."

"Did he read the telegram to you?" Eaton asked. "It was in code. If it was meant for him, he ought to be able to read it."

"No, he didn't. Will you?"

Eaton halted while he recalled the exact wording of the message. "No."

Connery paused and looked to Avery and the girl. "You'll wait a minute, Mr. Avery; and you, Miss Santoine. I won't be long."

He left the washroom, and the sound of the closing of a door which came to Eaton a half-minute later told that he had gone out the front end of the car.

As the three sat waiting in the washroom, no one spoke. Eaton understood fully that the manner in which the evidence against him was being presented to him was not with any expectation that he could defend himself; Avery and Connery were obviously too certain of their conclusion for that; rather, as it was being given thus under Avery's direction, it was for the effect upon Harriet Santoine and to convince her fully. But Eaton had understood this from the first. It was for this reason he had not attempted to deny having rung Santoine's bell, realizing that if he denied it and it afterward was proved, he would appear in a worse light than by his inability to account for or assign a reason for his act. And he had proved right in this; for the girl had not been convinced. So now he comprehended that something far more convincing and more important was to come; but what that could be, he could not guess.

The conductor appeared in the door of the washroom followed by the Englishman from Eaton's car, Henry Standish. Connery carried the sheet on which he had written the questions he had asked Eaton, and Eaton's answers.

"What name were you using, Mr. Eaton, when you came from Asia to the United States?" the conductor demanded.

Eaton reflected. "My own," he said. "Philip D. Eaton."

"Mr. Standish"—Connery faced the Englishman—"you came from Yokohama to Seattle on the Tamba Maru, didn't you? Do you remember this Mr. Eaton among the passengers?"

"No."

"Do you know he was not among the passengers?"

"Yes, I do."

"How do you know?"

The Englishman took a folded paper from his pocket, opened it, and handed it to the conductor. Connery, taking it, held it out to Eaton.

"Here, Mr. Eaton," he said, "is the printed passenger list of the people aboard the Tamba Maru prepared after leaving Yokohama for distribution among the passengers. It's unquestionably correct. Will you point out your name on it?"

Eaton made no move to take the paper; and after holding it long enough to give him full opportunity, Connery handed it back to the Englishman.

"That's all, Mr. Standish," he said.

Eaton sat silent as the Englishman, after staring curiously around at them with his bulging, interested eyes, left the washroom.

"Now, Mr. Eaton," Connery said, as the sound of Standish's steps became inaudible, "either you were not on the Tamba Maru or you were on it under some other name than Eaton. Which was it?"

"I never said I was on the Tamba Maru," Eaton returned steadily. "I said I came from Asia by steamer." You yourself supplied the name Tamba Maru."

"In case of questioning like that, Mr. Eaton, it makes no difference whether you said it or I supplied it in your hearing. If you didn't correct me, it was because you wanted me to get a wong impression about you. You weren't on the Tamba Maru, were you?"

"No I was not."

"You did come from Asia though as your railroad ticket seemed to show?"

"Yes."

"From Yokohama?"

"The last port we stopped at before sailing for Seattle was Yokohama—yes."

Connery reflected. "You had been in Seattle, then, at least five days; for the last steamer you could have come on docked five days before the Tamba Maru. In fact, Mr. Eaton, you had been on this side of the water for as many as eleven days, had you not?"

"Eleven days?" Eaton repeated. "Yes; for it was just eleven days before this train left Seattle that you came to the house of Mr. Gabriel Warden and waited there for him till he was bought home dead!"

Eaton, sitting forward a little, looked up at the conductor; his glance caught Avery's an instant; he gazed then to Harriet Santoine. At the charge, she had started; but Avery had not. The identification, therefore, was Connery's, or had been agreed upon by Connery and Avery between them; suggestion of it had not come from the Santoines. And Connery had made the charge without being certain of it; he was watching the effect, Eaton now realized, to see if what he had accused was correct.

"Isn't that so?" Connery demanded. "Or do you want to deny that too and have it proved on you later?"

Again for a moment Eaton sat silent. "No", he decided, "I do not deny that."

"Then you are the man who was at Warden's the night he was murdered?"

"Yes," said Eaton, "I was there that evening. I was the one who came there by appointment and waited till after Mr. Warden was brought home dead."

"So you admit that ?" Connery gloated; but he could not keep from Eaton a sense that, by Eaton's admission of the fact, Connery had been disappointed.

"All right, Mr. Eaton!" Connery returned to his charge. You are that man. So besides whatever else that means, you'd been in Seattle eleven days and yet you were the last person to get aboard this train, which left a full hour after its usual starting time. Who were you waiting to see get on the train before you yourself took it?"

Eaton wet his lips. To what was Connery working up? The probability, now rapidly becoming certainty, that in addition to the recognition of him as the man who had waited at Warden's—which fact anyone at any time might have charged—Connery knew something else which the conductor could not have been expected to know—this dismayed Eaton the more by its indefiniteness. And he saw, as his gaze shifted to Avery, that Avery knew this thing also.

"What do you mean by that question?" he asked.

"I mean that—however innocent or guilty may be the chance of your being at Mr. Warden's the night he was killed—you'll have a hard time proving that you did not wait and watch and take this train because Basil Santoine had taken it; and that you were not following him. Do you deny it?"

Eaton was silent.

Connery, bringing the paper in his hand nearer to the window again, glanced down once more at the statement Eaton had made. "I asked you who you knew in Chicago," he said, "and you answered 'No one.' That was your reply, was it not?"

"Yes."

"You know no one in Chicago?"

"No one," Eaton repeated.

"And certainly no one there knows you well enough to follow your movements in relation to Mr. Santoine. That's a necessary assumption from the fact that you know no one at all there."

The conductor pulled a telegram from his pocket and handed it to Avery, who, evidently having already seen it, passed it on to Harriet Santoine. She took it, staring at it mechanically and vacantly; then suddenly she shivered, and the yellow paper which she had read slipped from her hand and fluttered to the floor. Connery stooped and picked it up and handed it toward Eaton.

"This is yours," he said.

Eaton had sensed already what the nature of the message must be, though as the conductor held it out to him he could read only his name at the top of the sheet and did not know yet what the actual wording was below. Acceptance of it must mean arrest, indictment for the crime against Basil Santoine; and that, whether or not he later was acquitted, must destroy him; but denial of the message now would be hopeless.

"It is yours, isn't it?" Connery urged.

"Yes; it's mine," Eaton admitted; and to make his acceptance definite, he took the paper from Connery. As he looked dully down at it, he read:

"He is on your train under the name of Dorne."

The message was not signed.

Connery touched him on the shoulder. "Come with me, Mr. Eaton."

Eaton got up slowly and mechanically and followed the conductor. At the door he halted and looked back; Harriet Santoine was not looking; her face was covered with her hands; Eaton hesitated; then he went on. Connery threw open the door of the compartment next to the washroom and corresponding to the drawing room at the other end of the car, but smaller.

"You'll do well enough in here."

He closed the door upon Eaton and locked it. As Eaton stood staring at the floor, he could hear through the metal partition of the washroom the nervous, almost hysterical weeping of an overstrained girl. The thing was done; in so far as the authorities on the train were concerned, it was known that he was the man who had had the appointment with Gabriel Warden and had disappeared; and in so far as the train officials could act, he was accused and confined for the attack upon Basil Santoine. But besides being overwhelmed with the horror of this position, the manner in which he had been accused had roused him to helpless anger, to rage at his accusers which still increased as he heard the sounds on the other side of the partition, where Avery was now trying to silence Harriet Santoine and lead her away.

CHAPTER IX

The Blind Man's Eyes.

At noon Connery came to his door, and behind Connery, Eaton saw Harriet Santoine and Avery. Eaton jumped up, and as he saw the girl's pale face, the color left his own.

"Miss Santoine has asked to speak to you," Connery announced; and he admitted Harriet Santoine and Avery, and himself remaining outside in the aisle, closed the door upon them.

"How is your father?" Eaton asked the girl.

"He seems just the same; at least, I can't see any change, Mr. Eaton."

"Can Doctor Sinclair see any difference?" Eaton asked.

"Doctor Sinclair will not commit himself except to say that so far as he can tell, the indications are favorable. He seems to think—" The girl choked; but when she went on, her blue eyes were very bright and her lips did not tremble. "Doctor Sinclair seems to think, Mr. Eaton, that Father was found just in time, and that whatever chance he has for recovery came from you. Sometimes Father had insomnia and wouldn't get to sleep till late in the morning; so I—and Mr. Avery too—would have left him undisturbed until noon. Doctor Sinclair says that if he had been left as long as that, he would have had no chance at all for life."

"He has a chance, then, now?"

"Yes; but we don't know how much. I—I wanted you to know, Mr. Eaton, that I recognize—that the chance Father may have came through you, and that I am trying to think of you as the one who gave him the chance."

The warm blood flooded Eaton's face, and he bowed his head. She, then, was not wholly hostile to him; she had not been completely convinced by Avery.

Her eyes rested upon Eaton steadily; and while he had been appealing to her, a flush had come to her cheeks and faded away and come again and again with her impulses as he spoke.

"If you didn't do it, why don't you help us?" she cried.

"Help you?"

"Yes; tell us who you are and what you are doing? Why did you take the train because Father was on it, if you didn't mean any harm to him? Why don't you tell us where you are going or where you have been or what you have been doing? Why can't you give the name of anybody you know or tell us of anyone who knows about you?"

"I might ask you in return," Eaton said, "why you thought it worth while, Miss Santoine, to ask so much about myself when you first met me and before any of this had happened? Why were you curious about me?"

"My father asked me to find out about you."

"Why?"

Harriet had reddened under Eaton's gaze. "You understand, Mr. Eaton, it was—was entirely impersonal with me. My father, being blind, is obliged to use the eyes of others—mine, for one; and he has Mr. Avery. He calls us his eyes, sometimes; and it was only—only because I had been commissioned to find out about you that I was obliged to show so much curiosity."

Harriet arose, and Eaton got up as she did and stood as she went toward the door.

Avery had reached the door, holding it open for her to go out. Suddenly Eaton tore the handle from Avery's grasp, slammed the door shut upon him and braced his foot against it.

"Miss Santoine," he pleaded, his voice hoarse with his emotion, "for God's sake, make them think what they are doing before they make a public accusation against me—before they charge me with this to others not on this train! It will not be merely accusation they make against me—it will be my sentence! I shall be sentenced before I am tried—condemned without a chance to defend myself! That is the reason I could not come forward after the murder of Mr. Warden. I could not have helped him—or aided in the pursuit of his enemies—if I had appeared; I merely would have been destroyed myself! The only thing I could hope to accomplish has been in following my present course—which, I swear to you, has no connection with the attack upon your father. What Mr. Avery and Connery are planning to do to me, they cannot undo. They will merely complete the outrage and injustice already done me—of which Mr. Warden spoke to his wife—and they will not help your father. For God's sake, keep them from going further!"

Her color deepened, and for an instant, he thought he saw full belief in him growing in her eyes; but if she could not accept the charge against him, neither could she consciously deny it, and the hands she had been pressing together suddenly dropped.

"I—I'm afraid nothing I could say would have much effect on them, knowing as little about—about you as I do!"

They dashed the door open then—silenced and overwhelmed him; and they took her from the room and left him alone again. But there was something left with him which they could not take away; for in the moment he had stood alone with her and passionately pleading, something had passed between them—he could give no name to it, but he knew that Harriet Santoine never could think of him again without a stirring of her pulses which drew her toward him.

They Dashed the Door Open, Then—

The following morning the relieving snowplows arrived from the East, and Eaton felt it was the beginning of the end for him. He watched from his window men struggling in the snow about the forward end of the train; then the train moved forward past the shoveled and trampled snow where rock and pieces of the snowplow were piled beside the track—stopped, waited; finally it went on again and began to take up its steady progress.

The attack upon Santoine having taken place in Montana, Eaton thought that he would be turned over to the police somewhere within that state, and he expected it would be done at the first stop; but when the train slowed at Simons, he saw the town was nothing more than a little hamlet beside a side-track. They surely could not deliver him to the village authorities here.

It made no material difference to him, Eaton realized, whether the police took him in Montana or Chicago, since in either case recognition of him would be certain in the end; but in Chicago this recognition must be immediate, complete, and utterly convincing.

The train was traveling steadily and faster than its regular schedule; it evidently was running as a special, some other train taking the ordinary traffic; it halted now only at the largest cities. In the morning it crossed into Minnesota; and in the late afternoon, slowing, it rolled into some large city which Eaton knew must be Minneapolis or St. Paul. The car here was uncoupled from the train and picked up by a switch engine; as dusk fell, Eaton, peering out of his window, could see that they had been left lying in the railroad yards; and about midnight, awakening in his berth, he realized that the car was still motionless. He could account for this stoppage in their progress only by some change in the condition of Santoine. Was Santoine sinking, so that they no longer dared to travel? Was he, perhaps—dead?

No sounds came to him from the car to confirm Eaton in any conclusion; there was nothing to be learned from anyone outside the car.

Eaton lay for a long time, listening for other sounds and wondering what was occurring—or had occurred—at the other end of his car. Toward morning he fell asleep.

CHAPTER X

Publicity Not Wanted.

The alarm of the cry came to answer Eaton's question early the next morning. He threw up the curtain and saw a vagrant newsboy, evidently passing through the railroad yards to sell to the trainmen. Eaton, hailing the boy put out his hand for a paper. He spread the news-sheet before him and read that Santoine's condition was very low and becoming rapidly worse. But below, under a Montana date-line, Eaton saw it proclaimed that the blind millionaire was merely sick; there was no suggestion anywhere of an attack. The paper stated only that Basil Santoine, returning from Seattle with his daughter and his secretary, Donald Avery, had been taken seriously ill upon a train which had been stalled for two days in the snow in Montana. The column ended with the statement that Mr. Santoine had passed through Minneapolis and gone on to Chicago under care of Dr. Douglas Sinclair.

Eaton stared at the newspaper without reading, after he saw that. He had not realized, until now that he was told that Harriet Santoine had gone—for if her father had gone on, of course she was with him—the extent to which he had felt her fairness, almost her friendship to him. At least, he knew now that, since she had spoken to him after he was first accused of the attack on her father, he had not felt entirely deserted or friendless till now.

But why, if Santoine had been taken away, or was dead or dying, had they left Eaton all night in the car in the yards? Since Santoine was dying, would there be any longer an object in concealing the fact that he had been murdered?

RESOLUTIONS

A meeting of school officers of Wright county for the purpose of considering the proposed bill for a state tax levy was held in the county superintendent's office at Clarion on February 5th.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Whereas, There is a posposal to lift ten mills out of the local school tax levy and add it to the state levy the proceeds of the ten mill school tax levy to be distributed back to the public school districts on a basis which takes into conideration the number of pupils being educated in each and the standard of educational facilities provided under the following classification:

Approved twelve year graded schools.

Elementary grade schools.

One teacher schools.

We, the representatives of the school boards in Wright county, feel that the proposed plan would be no relief in the tax burden to the largest per cent of the property owners in our county, and be it.

Resolved, that we, the representatives of our respective school boards hereby disapprove of the plan of taking away from the local communities the right to levy and expend such a large amount in school funds.

Belmond Teams Continue Winning

Belmond Takes Kanawha And Rowan Teams Into Camp By Easy Scores.

SHEFFIELD IS NEXT GAME

Belmond added another victory to its long list by defeating Kanawha 31 to 11 last Friday. This making the 10th victory for Belmond. They have not been defeated. The game was inclined to be somewhat rough at times, aside from that it was a good game better then the score would indicate. Belmond's lineup has somewhat changed, Stapley was shifted to running guard and Christie for Stapley. It is hoped this will prove more satisfactory. Coach Pals used his second string during the second half. They proved themselves to be equal to the first's team. The boys have a splendid team this year, the best in the history of Belmond. They appreciate having a good crowd out to their games and will give you your money's worth. The Freshman team played the 8th grade. The yearling won by the score 15 to 4 due to good fast team work.

The high school basket ball teams of boys and girls from Rowan were in Belmond Tuesday evening to play corresponding teams here.

The girls' game was played first and resulted in a tie, 5 to 5. It was well played, both teams showing skill and doing hard work. Spectators report that the Belmond girls' team in this game played its old time form and did perhaps their best work of the present season. They have a splendid team this year and Miss Sharon is putting in a good deal of time for practice, in preparation for the Sheffield game next Friday night.

The boys' game result in a score of 19 to 13 in favor of Belmond, but it was not a walk away by any means. At one time during the first half Rowan was ahead with a score of 9 to 5, altho the second team played most of the first half. The boys played a much poorer game than they usually exhibit.

KEEPING HISTORY STRAIGHT

The basket ball game between the Hampton high school second team and the Belmond high school quintet was not played at Belmond last Friday evening as scheduled. After the first half, Superintendent Cecil and Coach Harshbarger decided that it would be better to forfeit the game to Belmond than to allow their officiating by the referee. The referee refused to give the name of a Hampton player on whom he had called a foul to the score-keeper. When pressed for the name he replied; "I'm refereeing this game and if Hampton doesn't like it let them forfeit."—Hampton Chronicle.

The above refers to the game a week ago Friday night, when the Hampton coach showed the yellow and took his team from the floor to avoid a hard licking. The Hampton team contained four of their first-string men, and was by no means a "second." The referee did not refuse to call the name of the player—he did call him, and because the foul was the fourth and put that player out of the game, Hampton kicked. The referee then made the remark qouted, in substance, and the coach jumped at the chance to quit. This explanation in just to "keep history straight".

COMBINATION SALE!

In order to make arrangements for room, if you have anything for the Combination Sale it will be necessary to commence listing at once with me or at the Belmond Savings Bank. Horses, hogs, and cattle will be numbered as listed and sold as numbered. Dates of the sale will be given in the Independent next week.

George Gelder left yesterday on the first leg of his journey to West Halton Doncaster, England, where he will spend three months visiting his home relatives and friends. He goes to New York City, from which place he sails on Saturday at four o'clock. Before leaving he ordered the Independent sent to him in England so he can keep track of affairs at home while away.

The big farm sale of George Polmateer's which was billed for Tuesday, February 13, was postponed until Saturday, February 24 on account of the young blizzard Tuesday. Geo is closing out all his farm equipment and stock preparatory to moving to Canada. He has some fine stuff, and is advertising his new date in the Independent this week. His bill may be found on page 7 of this issue.

PAVILION MEETING DRAWS BIG CROWD

Many Farmers Attend—Have Cite In View—Waiting For Plans From Ames.

The second meeting on the Sales Pavilion for Belmond was held at the city hall last Thursday evening, and was attended by a crowded house. Sentiment in favor of the pavilion idea appears to be rapidly rounding into favorable shape. Many farmers who have not heretofore given it much thought, are favoring the idea, while among the business men the favorable sentiment continues to grow. The committees are still waiting for plans from the engineering department at Ames, and when they are received and final arrangements completed, the real soliciting will start. It is believed that a good pavilion can be erected for ten thousand dollars or less, including cost of lot. With proper management, which is assured, it should be a paying proposition.

PURE BRED HOG IS A CORN SAVER.

"The same amount of feed that will make a common hog of 175 pounds will make a purebred hog of 241 pounds." This is the conclusion of the Bureau of Animal Husbandry of the United State Department of Agricultural after making an investigation and test with several thousand head of scrub and pure bred hogs belonging to more than 300 owners. In other words, 66 pounds more pork was marketed in the pure bred hog hides with the same care and same feed as were marketed in the carcass of the common hog.

It is estimated that the average farmer feeds ten bushels of corn to produce 100 pounds of pork, and it would therefore take about seven bushels of corn to produce the extra 66 pounds which the common hog would have to put in to be equal to weight to the pure bred. Figuring this corn at 60c a bushel, it would mean that it costs $4.20 more to grow the common hog. If a farmer markets 50 head, it would mean that it has cost him $210 more to grow the common herd than if they had been pure bred hogs.

There are seven pigs in an average litter, and it would therefore take seven sows to produce a herd of 50 porkers. If the farmer having seven common sows would market them, which weighing at maturity around 350 pounds, at the present market prices of about 8c, they would return him $196. This latter amount plus $210, which he loss in extra feed in feeding their progeny for market, would supply him with money enough to buy seven pure bred sows at around $58 apiece. The farmer cannot afford to waste feed and time with scrub hogs when he can buy pure breds as closely at home as farmers of this locality can secure them.

Some farmers in this community have been raising pure breds for a number of years. They evidently have found that it pays them to do so, as they are sticking to the pure bred hogs.

IOWA TOWNSHIP FARM BUREAU MEETING

The ladies of Iowa Township will hold an all day meeting at the home of Mrs. Chas. Richards, two and one half miles east of Rowan, Friday February 23rd. Ladies are requested to bring sandwiches and one other article of food for picnic dinner. At this meeting a demonstration on the making of cheddar cheese will be given. Everyone is invited.

BABY PASSES AWAY

Dale LeRoy Obrecht, the 5 months old baby of Mr. and Mrs. Chas Obrecht, died at the home in north Belmond last Saturday, after an illness of about two weeks. The child had never been very strong, but was growing nicely until about two weeks ago when he contracted a bad cold, which turned into pneumonia, causing death February 10, 1923. He was born August 30, 1922, and was five months and 11 days old at his death. Funeral services were held at the house Monday afternoon at 1:00 o'clock. Rev. S. U. Leinbach of the Congregational church in charge and interment was made in Franklin Grove cemetery. The parents have the sympathy of the entire community in the loss of their little one.

PRITCHARDS HOME FROM CALIFORNIA

Garner Signal—Mayor W. S. Pritchard and wife returned last Thursday from their six weeks visit in California. They went out especially to see Walt's father, and incidentally to call on their many friends of former days who are now located in the land of sunshine. They had a wonderfully good time and saw a lot of country. Walt says they drove about 3000 miles up and down the coast, and nearly every mile on pavement.

They came home by way of El Paso and Tulsa, Oklahoma, where they visited Paul and his wife and the grandchildren.

They spent a day and a half with Paul and his family at Tulsa. They live on a farm seven miles from Tulsa and Paul has some cows, hogs and chickens. Paul is in the real estate business with Joe McGuire, formerly of Belmond and Ft. Dodge. They are buying leases on oil lands and expect to make a million dollars, or some such amount.

Walt phoned from Tulsa regarding the condition of Mrs. Rosecrans, Mrs. Pritchard's sister, and they cut their visit short on learning of her serious condition. They arrived home Thursday and were glad to get back, after a pleasant six weeks away from the cares of every-day life.

During their stay in California they spent nearly every day going some place and looking up some of their old friends. Walt says he drove his father's Ford, Walt Blume's Cadillac and Jennie Elder's Essex.

Walt got his fill of mountain driving. He says that his hair actually stood up when he came to some of the places in the road. The road is blasted out in the rock and in many places not wide enough for cars to pass. At most places you can see but a few feet ahead and one place there was a steady ascent for six miles. For one not used to that kind of roads, Walt says it is altogether too hard on the nerves.

Raymond Healey is working in the Sun Drug Co. store in Los Angeles, and George Pabst, formerly of Klemme, is working for the same company at Long Beach.

Mr. Pritchard says that he enjoyed the trip all the while and would like to take it again some day. Only once while he was in California did he see any frost, and then it was very light.

A FEW DOINGS OF THE DISTRICT COURT

Monitor—Mrs. Thea Tollefson of Eagle Grove was committed to the state hospital at Cherokee last week for treatment for mental trouble. Deputy and Mrs. Fred Johnson accompanied the unfortunate woman to the asylum. The husband was the complaining witness and alleged his wife had not spoken to him for three years; that she would cook her own meals, but not his. The wife is 42 and the husband nearly sixty. They have three children whose ages range from 9 to 12 years.

Licenses to wed were issued during the past week to Julien Albert Johnson of Albert Lea, Minn., and Edna Worrick of Clarion; John Frank Rockow and Agnes Tressa Lantz of Dows; William Schroeder and Amelia Hipp of Dows.

The U. S. Government by L. E. Bladine internal revenue collector at Dubuque, has filed suit against J. T. Johnson of Eagle Grove to collect $225 as his individual income tax and five per cent penalty and twelve per cent interest from December 15, 1921.

He is at present employed in the Austin abstract office as assistant to Mr. Austin, and will continue to make Clarion his home. The bride is a very charming and talented young lady the daughter of Mrs. Irene Bailey, formerly of Belmond. For the past year she has been a student in the Minneapolis Institute of Art. MRS. CARPENTER DIES AT GOODELL HOME

Well Known Goodell Woman Passes Away—Other News Of Neighbor Town.

MRS. LYDIA CARPENTER

Another useful life was completed when Mrs. Carpenter on February fifth closed her eyes in her last long sleep. She had been failing in health for over a year. About two weeks ago she was taken with pneumonia and her weakened condition made her unable to combat the disease.

Miss Lydia Smith was born at Polo, Ill., March 9, 1871 and died at her home on February 5, 1923; age 51 years, 10 months, and 27 days.

In the Fall of 1881 she, with her parents, brothers and sisters moved to Traer, Ia. Here she spent her youthful days . On December 24, 1895 she was united in marriage to Alfred Charles Carpenter. For three years they lived in Goodell, then moved to their present home.

To this union were born six children, all of whom are living; Thelma Lucinda Schlichting, Harry Lenard, Loyd Merle, Thora Mary, Alfred Verl, and Richard Charles.

She leaves to mourn her departure her children, husband, Albert Schlichting, son-in-law, Mrs. Loyd Carpenter, daughter-in-law, her mother, Mrs. Smith of Traer, Ia., two sisters Mrs. Bell Jordan of Traer, Ia., and Mrs. Mary Roberts, Polo, Ill., three brothers, William L. Smith of St. Louis, Mo., Fran and Robert of Traer, Ia., and many friends and neighbors.

While she lived at Traer, Ia she worshipped at the Methodist church and was a regular and faithful attendant of the Methodist Sunday school. Shortly after her marriage she united with the United Brethren church at Goodell, and remained firm in the faith. The subject of christianity was a frequent topic of conversation with her. She was a great lover of beautiful flowers. Her yard in the summer time was an inspiring flower garden. And in the winter her home was brightened by numerous and various plants and flowers. Mrs. Carpenter was a woman of high ideals for her children and no sacrifice was thought too great in order to realize those ideals. She was a great home builder. Every effort was made to make her home attractive and inviting to her family and to the young people of the neighborhood. Here the young people received a warm welcome and enjoyed many social afternoons and evenings. But to build a home and rear a large family in these trying times takes more than earthly means; it takes fesh and blood, it takes life. But in this sacrifice she rejoiced. Indeed she looked well to the ways of her household. She has left her children a priceless legacy. A faithful and sacrificing wife, a kind and loving mother has gone to her heavenly reward. No more will her voice be heard; her chair is vacant, but her sweet influence still lives in the home.

Those from away that attended the funeral were her two sisters, the brother from St. Louis, and her brother Robert of Traer, Ia. In her sickness she had the best of medical care and nursing but these could not take the hand of death..

The funeral was at the U. B. church, conducted by the pastor, Rev. H. T. Miller, on February 7. Her body was laid to rest in the cemetery East of Goodell.

Dr. Snearly returned from Indianapolis, where he attended the funeral of his sister, last Thursday.

Misc McCormick left last Friday for Ames. She returned on Sunday.

Mrs. Frank Clark is improving nicely. It is reported that she is able to sit up.

Mrs. Bell Jordan, who was here to attend the funeral of her sister, Mrs Carpenter, returned to Traer on Wednesday night.

Mr. and Mrs. Joe Heginger have been sick with very bad colds the past week.

Jack Zielie was laid up last week with a severe cold.

Amos Hanson and Miss Selma Sandberg visited at the Earl Jeneson home last Thursday evening.

Mrs. John Savogue was obliged to be in the house most of last week because of a severe cold.

On February 6 Mrs. Geo. Ruka entertained the ladies of the Twin Lake Farm Bureau.

Mrs. Mary Roberts, of Polo, Ill., left Saturday night for a short visit with relatives at Traer, before going on to her home.

Saturday night Gus. Okrueg went to Chicago with three car loads of fat cattle.

Miss Hill spent Sunday with her parents at Clarion.

Last Friday night Prof. Nelson went to Belmond to referee a game of basket ball.

Mrs. Wesenberg entertained at her home on Sunday, Mr. and Mrs Geo. Ruka.

Last Friday H. R. Allben went to Hanlontown to visit his brother Vincent, who is teaching in the consolidated school there.

Mr. and Mrs. Shermon went to Belmond Monday afternoon where they took a Great Western train for their home in Wyoming. They have extended their visit because of Mrs. Shermon's mother being sick. Mrs. L. White is now getting along fine.

The Ladies Aid has been postponed one week because of Mrs. Savogue's illness.

Mrs. Earl Clark of Garner spent Sunday in Goodell.

Mrs. J. M. Jensen entertained a few of her friends at her home last Thursday, serving a dainty two course luncheon at the close of a social afternoon.

The boy's basket ball team won an easy victory from Kanawha Friday night. The first team seemed to score almost at will, so Coach Pals put in his second team for nearly half of the time. The final score was 31 to 11.

Tuesday night of this week Rowan's basket ball teams play both our girls and boys here. This is our last home game of the season.

Friday night both of our basket ball teams go to Sheffield to meet the teams of that place. These will no doubt be hard-fought games.

The situation in regard to sickness in our schools is much improved over last week. Many who were out last week are back at work now.

Monday afternoon the 1923 Annual Staff held an assembly at which they presented the matter of an annual for this year to the high school. Most of the students signed up for their annuals. Work on the photography is being carried on as fast as possible.

Miss Hill and the Operetta cast are working hard practicing for "Cherry-blossom". This is one of the biggest understakings the high school has attempted for some time. The operetta has a charming plot and beautiful music. Watch for the date of its performance.

The literary program which was postponed so many times on account of the illness of those who were to take part was given Tuesday afternoon. Election of officers was held also.

COMMUNITY CLUB PROGRAM FOR 1923-24

If the calendar committees plans can be carried out a program of practical benefit to every home represented in the Community club will be the result. It is planned to have five or six out-of-town speakers, if those wanted can be obtained. A speaker who has made a study of "The movie and its Influence" will take up one afternoon. There will be a talk on "Health and How to keep the mother fit"; an afternoon with a demonstration of the alteration and use of the commercial pattern. The committee hopes to get Mrs. Van Patten who pleased all who heard her at the county Federation meeting, to give her lecture on "The Spirit of the Home." Last, but not least, of the out of town speakers, being arranged for is Mrs. Max Mayer, who is so much admired by her Belmond audiences. Besides these there will be a program on automobile and highway laws that affect us, a home-coming day; a college girls day; a Christmas idea program and a memorial services in January, 1924, to Mr Crist, the community club's, best friend. On that day also, civic improvements for Belmond will be discussed.

Belmond has plenty of evidence that the Community club has warranted its existence and Mr. Crist's generosity to this organization ought to inspire us to "carry on" to make Belmond a still better place in which to live. Community service with high aims, is a sacrifice that enriches the one who gives such service as well as the community.

EVERY DAY IN EVERY WAY—

What? Pro and con, there is quite a little in this famous theory of Coue's. Coue as we gather it, says you can make yourself worse or better by insisting that you are thus or so. "Every day in every way you are getting better and better." And you get better—or thinner, or fatter, or shorter, or taller—or worse. If you keep it up long enough the doctors will all be out of business—or you will. You'll get better—or worse. It won't work in all ways, tho. We tried it on our bank account—"Every day in every way there's more and more," until pretty soon there should have been a pile. But the bank sent an overdraft notice just the same.

It will work in a good many cases, however. Last week we heard a certain Belmond citizen saying "Every day in every way I am getting drier and drier." And he was. But whether it was due to Coue or Atty. Jensen is the question.

Even at that, you know there is a lot in this mental suggestion. "As a man thinketh, so is he." Any physician will tell you that the mental attitude of a patient has much to do with his recovery. And we might better think we are getting better rather than worse even if we do kid ourselves in doing it. To our way of thinking, however, a little horse sense mixed with some Coueism will go a long ways toward obtaining the desired end. Coue, like all enthusiasts, puts too much stress on his own particular line, to the detriment of other equally important ones. Telling yourself you are getting better and better won't go nearly as far as to tell yourself you are, and then do something to make youself so. Coueism is the dream, which we think requires realistic accomplishments to make come true.

Your neighbor's daughter pounding out cat fights on the piano may be wonderful to her parents, but awful to you. You're going to have a hard job convincing yourself that every day in every way she's getting better and better. Your son imitating a dying calf on the trombone isn't going to get any better to your neighbor, either. They both require practical methods.

For years unto years the Republicans and Democrats have tried to make us think they were getting better and better. They are, in some ways—they ought to be, with the practice they've had. But you know and we all know, that they would be a good deal better if we gave them more of our valuable attention at election and primary times. A practicable application of horse sense—and perhaps a mule kick or two—with the theory would do wonders.

When you come to analyze the howdedo made over Coue in America you find it all centered on the one thing which Americans always grab—the slogan. The rhyme in "Every day in every way" catches the the fancy. The English, who are not as quick to grasp the new and unusual, and who haven't the knack of inventing slogans or catch phrases which is inborn in the Yankee, had the slogan of Coueism "Every day in every respect." It doesn't sound nearly as interesting does it, as "every day in every way?"

All this to the contrary notwithstanding, there is a lot of sense to Coue's idea, and if we all would only believe that "every day in every way we are getting better and better" maybe we would. At any rate, it wouldn't make us any worse.

FACTS AND COMMENTS

The final returns show that Ohio defeated the wine and beer amendment by 189,472.

The American Football Coaches Association passed a resolution at their recent meeting strongly opposing gambling or betting on football games.

Judge Webb of the United States District Court of North Carolina, in charging a jury, said, "The bootlegger and the blockader are fighting a hopeless cause. The hope in the hearts of a minority in this country that liquor is coming back is fast dying out."

A 9x24 banner has been posted on the Milano Hotel in San Jose, California, which states: "This building closed for one year for violation of the United States Prohibition Act. by order United States District Court." Such measures applied fearlessly and without discrimination would tremendously discourage the opposition to the prohibition law.

Mr. Thomas J. Hickey, President of the American Baseball Association says: "Prohibition has been the greatest blessing we ever enjoyed. The passing of the saloons increased our patronage wonderfully. It was a great business booster for us."

News from Canada indicates that the Dominion Government will shortly take further measures to prevent the exportation of liquor from Canadian provinces to the United States.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Livestock Marketing Meetings

The livestock marketing meetings which have been held in Wright county during the past week, have proved to be a great success from the standpoint of attendance at the various meetings and the extreme interest which has been shown by the farmers in so important a problem as the marketing of livestock products. The farmers are becoming intensely interested in the marketing of all kinds of farm products and these meetings have intensified this interest in livestock marketing work.

The annual meeting of the Clarion Livetock Shipping association brought out about two hundred farmers in and around Clarion. The Clarion Livestock Shippers were fortunate in having two speakers at their annual meeting, also in having splendid music furnished by the Meekers' orchestra. Prof. Sam H. Thompson, of the marketing department of the extension service, Ames and Knute Espe secretary of Iowa Federation of Livestock Shippers, of Des Moines, were present at the Clarion meeting. Secretary E. W. Campbell, of the Clarion association report that a sufficient number of livestock producers have signed the contract so that it will be put in force immediately.

Mr. Espe has given his time for the past week in assisting the county agent with the reorganizing of shipping associations at the various points. Succesful meetings were held at Belmond, Goldfield, Woolstock, Galt, and other points where there seems to be an interest in the livestock marketing work. The time has arrived when the farmer is not content with turning his livestock products over to a stock buyer and allow him to realize a margin on his labor in producing the livestock. The farmers have come to realize that by cooperating with one another, they are able to add, to their own account, the margin which has formerly gone to the stock buyer.

Dows Corn Show Great Success

The annual corn show and exhibit which was held at Dows last Wednesday and Thursday, February 7 and 8, was a decided success and the business men of Dows and the farmers of the surrounding territory should congratulate themselves upon having held a show which attracted as much attention as did this year's corn show.

One very outstanding feature of this corn show was the exceptional decorative ability which was exhibited in the various booths and displays. Charles Hemonway, proprietor of Chuck's cafe at Dows, is the one man who deserves most of the credit for the decorations at this show. Mr. Hemenway seems to be gifted along artistic lines and it was through his efforts that the splendid decorations were arranged. The corn palace which was bulit entirely out fo corn, covering the entire front of the building in which the corn show was held attracted attention for many miles around. The Des Moines Register had a reporter in Dows on the second day of the corn show and a report came out in the Register last week.

The 1923 corn show at Dows proved to be the most successful ever held in that city. The sentiment and enthusiasm for a good corn show in Dows seems to be increasing every year and the people of that community are beginning already to make plans for the 1924 corn show. The city of Dows and its good people in and around Dows have again demonstrated that the citizens of any community, both farmers and busniess men, can work together in such a way that it is for the mutual benefit of everyone concerned.

Prairie Dell Community Contest

The Prairie Dell Agricultural society of Lake township is back in "old form" again. On last Friday evening, the south half of the territory of the Prairie Dell Club put on a program at the Breckenridge school to settle the question as to whether north or south side division of the society should have the honor of giving the best program.

The interest in the Prairie Dell social life seems to be increasing and the members of the club are beginning to concern themselves as to how the crowds will be accomodated as time goes on. The little school house was crammed full at this meeting and standing room was at a premium after all had arrived. The improvised stage which was made of curtains on a wire had the effect of a real stage and those who took part in the short plays and dialogues did themselves credit in the entertainment which was provided. To date the north side has put on two entertainments receiving seventy-one points in the first and eighty points in the second. The Friday night entertainment was the first by the south side and they piled up eighty-five points. The next entertainment by the south side will probably tell the tale. The south side team was under the leadership of Russell Breckenridge as captain. Due credit should be given Hazel Mikelson, Mrs. Luther Clark, and Mrs. Russell Breckenridge who served on the entertainment committee.

The Prairie Dell Agricultural society which was organized a number of years ago under Mr. Benson's leadership has been in existence ever since its inception and has been holding its regular meetings. The spirit of cooperation among the members of this society is the kind which builds for one hundred per cent Americanism in any community.

Lincoln Meeting Well Attended

The postponed meeting of the Lincoln township Farm Bureau which was held in the Center school last Thursday evening, was attended by a group of interested people which packed the building to overflowing.

The evening's program opened with a short address by L. W. Collins, director of the Lincoln township Farm Bureau, in which he urged the closest cooperation among the members. This was followed by a short talk by the county agent who explained, briefly, the present activities of the farm bureau organization. Special music had been arranged for this program but owing to sickness in the community, those who were to take part were not able to attend.

Dr. J. F. Jamieson, of the Presbyterian church, gave a very interesting and stirring address at this meeting. His address was entirely different from what would naturally be expected in such a meeting. He told in a very interesting way, the world conditions as they exist today and brought out a number of current topics which are uppermost in the minds of our citizens today. In speaking of the important problems to today, he touched upon the "Occupation of the Ruhr Valley by the French," "The Withdrawal of the American Troops from Occupied Territory," "The General Attitude of the American People Towards French Occupancy of the Ruhr District," and "Passive Persistance by Germany to French Occupation."

This able address on topics of the times was highly appreciated by the people of Lincoln township and it was expressed by several members that an address of this kind is what an agricultural community should have occasionally, especially because of the fact that the average farmer does not have time to read enough to keep himself informed on international problems. His address to the Lincoln farmers is evidence that Dr. Jamieson is a student of world problems.

Evergreen Short Course

The annual short course of the Evergreen Sporting association was held at the Evergreen school house Friday and Saturday, February 2 and 3, and exhibits of corn, small grain, fruit, vegetables, and poultry, also entries in the home economics division were judged Friday afternoon and Saturday, morning. On account of the extremely cold weather, the judging of the livestock exhibit was postponed to Saturday, February 10.

The postponed judging of the livestock was held at the Darland farm last Saturday afternoon and the livestock exhibits were judged by County Agent H. C. Flint of Humboldt county. Some keen competition in the livestock exhibits was brought out and considerable interest was exhibited in this department of the short course.

The Evergreen short course, which is an annual affair, has been held for a good many years and the people living in that community pride themselves upon being able to hold such an agricultural exhibit in a farm community away from any town. The secret of their success in holding such a short course away from town is the fact that they believe in the closest cooperation with one another. The Evergreen Sporting association is a splendid example of a community in which all farmers "pull together."

The Corn Situation

The estimate of the 1922 corn crop is 2891 million bushels. By adding a carryover of 187 million bushels of last year's corn on farms on November 1, 1922, and the "visible supply" of 9 million bushels in commercial channels on the same date, we find an available supply of 3069 million bushels for the current year as compared with 3354 million bushels as of last year and 3348 million bushels two years ago.

Figures which have been compiled show that the distribution of corn into consumptive channels both domestic and export, in the 1921-22 crop year amounted to 3186 million bushels, the largest for any year on record. In the preceding year we find a distribution of 3053 million bushels. According to the U. S. department of agricultural our corn is consumed in the following ways: forty per cent is fed to hogs, twenty per cent to horses and mules, fifteen per cent to cattle, four per cent to poultry, one to sheep on farms, 5.5 per cent to livestock not on farms leaving ten per cent for human consumption, and four and one-half per cent for exports and miscellaneous uses.

Since over eighty-five per cent of the corn crop is fed, it is significant that estimate made by the department show more live stock on farms on January 1, 1923, than a year ago. Hogs increased 9.7 per cent, milk cows 1.4 per cent, other cattle 0.9 per cent and sheep 2.4 per cent. Mules increased 0.7 per cent but horses decreased 1.1 per cent. The department also estimates that 25 per cent more cattle were on feed in the corn belt on January 1 than on the same date in 1922 while the combined had 30 per cent more lambs in feed lots than a year ago. Another survey by the same agency indicates that the number of sows to farrow in the first six months of 1923 will be 13.1 per cent larger than in the spring of 1922. Receipts of hogs at the leading markets in the last three months have been twenty-four per cent larger and of cattle thirty-one per cent larger than in the same period a year ago.

A Complete Family

There's everything you need in tillage tools in the McCormick-Deering family—horse and tractor drawn disk, harrows, peg and spring-tooth harrows, Dunham culti-packers. The same is true of P. & O plows—a full family and every member a winner sturdy 2, 3, or 4-bottom, little Genius tractor plows, Little Wonder plows for small tractors, famous Diamond gang and sulky plows, and walking plows in all standard types and sizes. Disking with a McCormick-Deering disk after plowing with a P. & O. plow pays big. Culti-packing after seeding or planting firms the soil and promotes germination. Thorough tillage pays dividends in increased crops.

Use Practical "Big Ball" Twine

Two "Big Ball" fit any twine can snugly, and they are not josried around, while two of the ordinary old style balls fit the twine can loosely, and they have 40 per cent less twine than the "Big Balls." This means fewer stops in the field for twine. The patented cover winding of the "Big Ball" twine keeps it from collapsing or becoming enfirm and solid up to last hundred feet or so and does not snarl or tangle. "Big Ball" twine means less bulk to store, handle and haul, yet it costs no more than the ordinary. Ask for "Big Ball" twine for your harvest need and buy it now.

Primrose Oiler never Forgets

Some otherwise good cream separators have but one fault. If their oiling systems were up-to-date they would doubtless do satisfactory work and give less trouble. But you're buying "Ifs" when you get a cream separator, and that's why the primrose ball-bearing machine will meet your requirements in every way. The Primrose has an automatic splash oil system that never fails. You put in a supply of oil and the spindle driving gear sprays the oil to all working parts and is carried to the bearings through spiral grooves on the shafts. No oil holes to collect dirt and no oil cups. Considering the many other wonderful features on the new Ball-Bearing Primrose, is there any other machine you can think of that measures up to its all around quality and goodness.

OBITUARY

Dorothy Louise Koepke was born February 19, 1849, in Jacobshagen, Province of Pommern, Germany. She was confirmed in the Luthern faith; was married to Wm. Prilipp in 1876. They came to America in 1887 locating at Ft. Dodge Ia., where they were converted in the German M. E. church during their first year in that city. They united with the Evangelical church, bringing their church with them when moving to Meservey 8 years after their arrival at Fort Dodge. Until 9 years ago they lived on a farm 6 miles north of Meservey since then they have resided in town.

She was a true christian and a faithful wife and mother. Of her 10 children, 7 preceeded her in death; leaving to mourn her departure, her now sorrowing husband, 2 sons Albert and William and one daughter Amelia beside 18 grand-children and many friends.

She has been a patient sufferer for a number of years and in her last illness of four or five weeks was wholly resigned to the will of her Heavenly Father. She wrote and prepared all data for her obituary, carefully arranged her clothes for burial as well as other matters as cooly as one preparing to go on a journey.

When she believed the end was near she called all present to her side, naming each one and with a hand shake bid each one farewell saying "It is glorious! It is glorious! It is glorious! I see my Savior, now let me go; don't you hear the angels singing?" etc. After reviving somewhat she said "Why did you not let me go, I was nearly there."

Last Saturday a. m. February 10 she seemed quite well; she led the others in prayer at family devotion. She soon grew worse and shortly after 12 o'clock at noon she entered her eternal rest having reached the age of 73 years 11 months 22 days.

"Their eyes shall behold the King in His beauty; they shall behold the land that is afar off" Isa. 33:17.

Funeral services were held at the Evangelical church on Tuesday p. m. February 13, conducted by the pastor Rev. A. W. Schlesselman. Interment was made in the Meservey cemetery.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to thank our friends and neighbors for their kindly assistance and sympathy, and for the special help rendered us during the sickness and burial of our beloved wife and mother. Also for the beautiful floral offerings. Words fail to express our gratitude and appreciation for your kind deeds.

The wind blew at a terrific rate of speed all day causing the parents of the school children deep anxiety. School was dismissed early, giving the bus drivers a chance to get the children home in good time.

Our school teachers attended Institute at Mason City last Saturday. Misses Humke and Thomas returned the same day, the others remaining until Sunday.

HEAR RURAL CREDITS THIS WEEK IN SENATE

Des Moines ,February 12.—The most promnient proposed piece of legislation according to discussions in the campaigns of the past couple of years in Iowa and other agricultural states is rural credits and methods of furnishing relief to the chief industry of the mid-west and southern states. This subject is to furnish the program for the senate session the afternoon of Thursday, February 15th, according to agreement of members of the senate. The question will come up at that time for the consideration of Joint Resolution No. 2 by Senator M. L. Bowman, of Black Hawk county for many years connected with the extension department of Ames college. This resolution proposes to amend the state constitution to permit the establishment of credits to farmers. When the resolution came up last week the matter was discussed at some lenght and was then postponed until the commission appointed by the governor could complete its report and have the report printed for consideration and study. The senate and house had already appointed a joint committee to investigate and report on methods adopted by other states. These reports will be in the hands of the legislators the fifteenth it is promised. Members of the commission declare that systems of providing credits are practical and the reports will recommend that ware houses be provided for the storage of grain and the issuance of credit on receipts for the same and on real estate. During the first discussion of the joint resolution the following points were prominent in the issues raised:

1. The constitutionality of the legislation regarding class privileges and an amendment was proposed and accepted to help clear up this point.

2. A recognition that agricultural is the chief industry of the state of Iowa, yet believing that manufacturing is closely identified with the development of agriculture might not such state credits be extended to other lines of industry placing about the state loans the same safeguards that are placed in loans against rural lands and grain.

Members generally look upon the proposed rural credits system with favor yet the points outlined will undoubtedly be discussed at considerable lenght, it is predicted. To become a law the joint resolution must pass two general assemblies and then be voted on by the people.

State Audit and County Warrants

Spending money when there is no money in the accounts of the county on which warrants are drawn came up for spirited debate on the Tuck bill which sends county officers issuing the warrants and boards of supervisors for authorizing such warrants to jail won a large majority vote in the senate. An exception is made in court costs which can not be estimated and which are authorized by courts and not by board of supervisors, certain other emergency expenditures are excepted in the bill as it passed the senate. A bill in the house would require an audit of the books of school treasurers and of school boards by agents of the state auditor the same as being done at the present time with county and city offices. It has been claimed that the school funds which amount up to many times over the funds of city and county funds are managed in many cases without system and in a manner not warranted by law. Bills have been introduced looking to state audit of the books and accounts of the state board of education, state board of control, state board of agriculture and state highway commission. Another bill requires all state institutions, boards and commissions to adopt uniform systems of bookkeeping, etc., approved by the state executive council.

The Family Circle

Representative Hauge of Polk, who has seen the evil effects of the family circle in county offices after Des Moines has lost thousands of dollars through the practice of embezzling city and county funds by relatives of officials would prohibit any officer from employing a member of the family as assistant, clerk or in any other position. The anti-nepotism bill has been introduced many times in the Iowa legislature but has never become a law. It is likely to succeed at this session.

Temple of Justice

The Storey bill abolishes the commission appointed before the war to build a Temple of Justice, turns the appropriation back in the state treasury and the plans and proceedings of the commission into the hands of the state executive council. While Representative Storey claimed that at the proper time he would favor the construction of a temple of justice he did not think this was a proper time.

Highways Most Important

If the number of bills introduced and the discussions in the press are an indication it may be truthfully said that the highways are the most important matters before the general assembly. Bills have been introduces touching every phase of road making. The Gallagher resolution refusing federal aid in the construction of highways or for any other purpose was defeated by a large majority in the house. The next move was to abolish the state highway commission but accepting the federal aid makes it practically necessary to continue the commission with state and government management of road projects where federal aid is applied. Secretary Wallace under whose department at Washington federal aid to highways is determined came out strongly in letters urging Iowa legislators not to do anything to interfere with the plans of the government. Certain measures introduced would have cancelled further appropriations from the government in the building of Iowa highways and would have kept the progressive program of road making from making further improvements. The discussion still continues and the main issues will not be settled until near the close of the session. The effort to move the highway commission's offices to Des Moines is not as strong as it was before members of the highway committees and other legislators visited Ames and viewed the great plant and property there. However, this point is being vigorously urged by enemies of the commission.

Farm Bureau Wins

The two bills of Senator Johnston of Lucas to confine membership of farm bureaus to actual farmers and farm owners and to require a vote every two years of counties to determine whether the counties should continue to contribute to the maintainance of the farm bureaus were both overwhelmingly defeated in the senate. Senator Johnston called such appropriations subsidies to farmers and he was opposed to them unless the tax payers had an opportunity to vote on the question at stated intervals. During the dissussion it developed that the fight made by Senator Johnston was inspired by the Farm Unions which are said to be strong in several counties of the state and in Lucas county especially. Two or three members who represent counties with strong farm union organizations made an effort to dodge the vote. A call of the house was ordered and Senator Ethell of Davis, who was one of the five to vote for the bills, asked that the most diligent search be made in all parts of the temple for fear some great tragedy had been committed and the absent memebrs made away with. The bill received five votes showing the overwhelming majority of the senate favoring the farm bureau and its system of agricultural education.

County Superintendents

The bill repealing the county superintendent's law making this officer elective by the people passed the house by one majority. Objections to the bill were based largely on opportunities to secure more efficient officials by having superintendents chosen by an educational board of school officers. It was brought out that by a county wide election cities and towns which do not in fact come under the jurisdiction of the county superintendent would control the elections. It is understood, however that bills are to be voted on eliminating cities where county superintendents do not superintend from voting for such officers.

Work On Code

Regardless of the understanding that code revision would be suspended after February first code bills are being considered by the committees and by both houses when other legislation can be laid aside. Following out the agreement with the governor an earnest effort is being made to take up code bills which do not promise any great amount of argument and complete consideration.

Tax Revision

The report of the tax commission appointed by the last general assembly to report and submit bills changing the tax laws of the state so as to adjust valuations, assessments and tax levies is being considered at daily meetings of the ways and means committees of both branches of the assembly. To bring about just and equitable tax laws nas been the endeavor of every legislative body since Iowa became a state and the legislature at this time faces the most trying period in history. The commission was composed of men representing all interests and in many features the bills reported out are compromises it being understood the report was arrived at with a unanimous vote. Regardless of this the committees are again arguing the same points which for so long divided the commission. The committees may devote several weeks to these subjects and after that the two legislative bodies have an opportunity to split hairs and discuss differences of opinion. It seems to be quite sure now that gasoline is doomed to pay a tax for road making. Other states have adopted such measures and are proving satisfactory according to reports made to the committees. Every effort is made to cut down appropriations where such cuts are possible so as to reduce the state tax and counties, where the bulk of the tax money is spent, are being restricted in their expenditures.

Telephone Bill

Another telephone bill has been introduced placing the control of telephone companies under the jurisdiction of the state railroad commission. The first bills placed rate making with city councils. Owing to the fact that city councils would not have jurisdiction over long distance lines the new bill would make supervision by the state instead of by localities.

The Kenyon Incident

The resolution by Representative Blakee endorsing Judge William S. Kenyon which caused a stir in the state house for several days was withdrawn by the author on Friday. Democrats who saw an opportunity to embarrass the Republicans objected to the withdrawal of the resolution but the House which is overwhelmingly Republicans granted the request.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

CHAPTER VII.—Circumstances point to Eaton as Santoine's assailant.

CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on Warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Harriet Santoine to withhold judgment, telling her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers sufficiently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier requires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the position of a semi-prisoner.

He dressed and then paced back and forth the two or three steps his compartment allowed him. He stopped now and then to listen; from outside came the noises of the yard; but he made out no sound within the car. If it had been occupied as on the days previous, he must have heard some one coming to the washroom at his end. Was he alone in the car now, or had the customary moving about taken place before he awoke?

Finally, to free himself from his nervous listening for sounds which never came, he picked up the paper again. He read:

"The news of Mr. Santoine's visit of a week on the Coast, if not known already in great financial circles, is likely to prove interesting there. For years he has been the chief agent in keeping peace among some of the great conflicting interests, and more than once he has advised the declaring of financial war when war seemed to him the correct solution. Thus, five years ago, when the violent death of Matthew Latron threatened to precipitate trouble among western capitalists, Santoine kept order in what might very well become financial chaos. If his recent visit to the Pacific coast was not purely for personal reasons but was also to adjust antagonisms such as charged by Gabriel Warden before his death, the loss of Santoine at this time may precipitate troubles which, living, his advice and information might have been able to prevent."

Having read and reread this long paragraph, Eaton thrust the sheet out the window. As he sat thinking, with lips tight closed, he heard for the first time that morning footsteps at his end of the car. The door of his compartment was unlocked and opened, and he saw Doctor Sinclair.

"Mr. Santoine wants to speak to you," the surgeon announced quietly.

This startling negation of all he imagined, unnerved Eaton. He started up, then sank back for better composure.

"Mr. Santoine is here, then?"

"Here? Of course he's here?"

"And he's conscious?"

"He has been conscious for the better part of two days. Didn't they tell you?"

Eaton looked toward the window, breathing hard. "I heard the newsboys—"

Sinclair shrugged. "The papers print what they can get and in the way which seems most effective to them," was his only comment.

The surgeon led Eaton to the door of the drawing room, showed him in and left him.

Harriet Santoine was sitting on the little lounge opposite the berth where her father lay. She was watching the face of her father, and as Eaton stood in the door, he saw her lean forward and gently touch her father's hand; then she turned and saw Eaton.

"Here is Mr. Eaton, Father," she said.

Harriet Santoine Was Sitting on the Little Lounge Opposite the Berth Where Her Father Lay.

"Sit down," Santoine directed.

The blind man was very weak and must stay quite still; and he recognized it; but he knew too that his strength was more than equal to the task of recovery, and he showed that he knew it. His mind and will were, obviously, at their full activity, and he had fully his sense of hearing.

Harriet's lips trembled as she turned to Eaton; but she did not speak directly to him yet; it was Basil Santoine who suddenly inquired:

"What is it they call you?"

"My name is Philip D. Eaton." Eaton realized as soon as he had spoken that both question and answer had been unnecessary, and Santoine had asked only to hear Eaton's voice.

The blind man was silent for a moment, as he seemed to consider the voice and try again vainly to place it in his memories. Then he spoke to his daughter.

"Describe him, Harriet."

Harriet paled and flushed.

"About thirty," she said, "—under rather than over that. Six feet or a little more in height. Slender, but muscular and athletic. Skin and eyes clear and with a look of health. Complexion naturally rather fair, but darkened by being outdoors a good deal. Hair dark brown, straight and parted at the side. Smooth shaven. Eyes blue-gray, with straight lashes. Eyebrows straight and dark. Forehead smooth, broad and intelligent. Nose straight and neither short nor long; nostrils delicate. Mouth straight, with lips neither thin nor full. Chin neither square nor pointed, and without a cleft. Face and head, in general, of oval Anglo-American type."

"Go on," said Santoine.

Harriet was breathing quickly. "Hands well shaped, strong but without sign of manual labor; nails cared for but not polished. Gray business suit, new. Soft-bosomed shirt of plain design with soft cuffs. Medium-height turn-down white linen collar. Four-in-hand tie, tied by himself. Black shoes. No jewelry except watch-chain."

"In general?" Santoine suggested.

"In general, apparently well-educated, well-bred, intelligent young American. Expression frank. Manner self-controlled and reserved. Seems sometimes younger than he must be, sometimes older. Something has happened at some time which has had a great effect and can't be forgotten."

While she spoke, the blood, rising with her embarrassment, had dyed Harriet's face; suddenly now she looked away from him and out the window.

"He would be called, I judge, a rather likable-looking man?" Santoine said tentatively; his question plainly was only meant to lead up to something else; Santoine had judged in that particular already.

"Mr. Eaton"—Santoine addressed him suddenly—"I understand that you have admitted that you were at the house of Gabriel Warden the evening he was killed while in his car. Is that so?"

"Yes," said Eaton.

"You are the man, then, of whom Gabriel Warden spoke to his wife?"

"I believe so."

"You believe so?"

"I mean," Eaton explained quietly, "that I came by appointment to call on Mr. Warden that night. I believe that it must have been to me that Mr. Warden referred in the conversation with his wife which has since been quoted in the newspapers."

"Because you were in such a situation that, if Mr. Warden defended you, he would himself meet danger?"

"I did not say that," Eaton denied guardedly.

Belmond Enters Tournament At Britt

Enter At Britt Today—Then Go To Fort Dodge If They Win Out At Britt.

HAVE WON EVERY GAME

Belmond's champion basket ball team took the last game of the season Friday night, when they walloped the Kanawha team on its own floor by a score of 27 to 11. Both the first and second teams played a good game. This was the first time that Belmond has ever defeated Kanawha on it's home floor. Madsen was easily the outstanding star of the game, caging seven field goals. Leinbach and Stapley were the two main reasons for Kanawha's low score, their guarding being excellent.

Next Thursday and Friday the teams go to Britt where they will take part in the district tournament in which 10 teams are entered and local fans are hoping they bring home the bacon as they have been doing. The winners of this meet will go to Fort Dodge the following week. This is a new method to determine the state champion team. Never in Belmond's history has it had as strong a team as this year, a team that has not been defeated and which Belmond hopes and believes will not be. In the games played this year, Belmond has scored a total of 298 points to their opponents 125. The scores by games have been as follows:

Belmond 30, Meservey 5.
Belmond 28, Sheffield 20.
Belmond 38, Alumni 10.
Belmond 24, Garner 9.
Belmond 26, Clarion 5.
Belmond 21, Garner 14.
Belmond 14, Hampton 4.
Belmond 21, Rowan 5.
Belmond 31, Kanawha 11.
Belmond 19, Rowan 13.
Belmond 19, Sheffield 18.
Belmond 27 Kanawha 11.

Here's to the boys, may they bring home to Belmond the championship honors of the state. Much credit should be given Coach Pals for his training and hard work with the team.

THE GASOLINE TAX

The latest development in the legislature is a sentiment favoring a gasoline tax to be given to the counties in which it is collected, and to be devoted to the improvement of the roads. Now if they will abolish the automoblie tax and make the gasoline tax strong enough to raise the same amount of money, this paper will favor it.

There is no doubt that the gasoline tax is more equitable than the auto tax. With a flat tax on autoes the man who keeps a pleasure car and who drives it once a month, pays exactly the same amount as the man who drives his car every day. Under our present system the proprietor of a jitney bus pays no more than the owner of a jitney that does not see the outside of the garage more than twice a year. This is manifestly wrong.

The gasoline tax will make the people who use the roads, pay for them. That will be just and equitable.

However, there should also be a tire tax. Without it we can not catch the hard-tired six-ton trucks that do more to damage the roads than one hundred autoes. A tire tax should be arranged to tax the big truck, especially the truck with solid tires.

With a tire tax and a gasoline tax, and the auto tax abolished, we would come pretty near to placing the expenses where they belong.—Humboldt Republican.

A. A. KEISER

A. A. Keiser, one of Belmond's best known citizens, and for many years a resident of this place, died at his home in Belmond Monday morning, February 26, death being caused by hardening of the arteries. For some time Mr. Keiser had not been in good health, and about a month ago disposed of his painting business and retired from active work. He was 64 years, 11 months and 14 days of age at his death. Funeral services were held Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock at the house Rev. Father Eardley in charge, and interment was made in Franklin Grove cemetery beside his daughter, Iris, who preceded him in death many years ago. The wife, one daughter, Ora, residing near Ames, and other relatives and friends are left to mourn his passing.

Mrs. Peter Stacy has been very ill the past week with pneumonia and for a time was in a very serious condition. She is much improved at this writing and her speedy recovery is now expected.

ANOTHER SHEFFIELD BANK FAILS TO OPEN

The Farmers and Merchants Bank a private bank at Sheffield, went into the hands of a receiver last Monday. The institution was organized over twenty years ago by William Storck and C. J. LeValley, and has been conducted by them since that time. The bank had enjoyed a successful business for many years, and its total liabilities at this time run about $400,000, with deposits of nearly the same amount. The depositors stand to lose heavily in the failure of the bank.

Land speculations and the loaning of credits to promotion enterprises which have failed to develope as anticipated, brought about the failure of the bank. The crash in financial conditions two years ago is of course the real cause of the failure, because if business condition had continued even at a normal gait during the fall of 1920 and year of 1921 the present frozen credits of the bank would have been largely reduced, and the bank would then have been able to carry any ordinary slow paper.

E. W. James, a substantial citizen of Sheffield, who has the confidence of his neighbors and acquaintances, has been appointed receiver for the bank, and is now busy getting out reports of the assets and liabilities of the bank, and will file them in court as soon as completed.

The failure of the bank did not cause any excitement in Sheffield, as it was generally supposed by the citizens of that town that the bank was having hard work weathering the storm.

The Sheffield Bank which closed several months ago, was another private banking institution, and had been conducted by the Carhart family for over thirty years. The affairs of this bank are now being aired in the state and federal courts. The failure of the two banks has given the good people of Sheffield a harder knock than they had coming to them.—Hampton Chronicle.

BELMOND MAN'S PLEA TO ENTER ASYLUM IS GRANTED

Clarinda, Feb. 24—An incident said to be so rare as to place it in a class by itself occurred here when a service man appeared at office of the secretary of the Page county board of insanity commissioners, asked to be adjudged insane and sent to the state asylum here, and whose singular request was acted upon favorably and the young man calmly pocketed the commitment papers much as one would a contract of any kind, and started off for the asylum, where he was duly admitted. The young man who figured in this strange drama was Robert W. Richardson, whose home is in Belmond, Wright county Iowa.

He is 38 years of age. He was wounded in the world war and ordinarily his mind is not affected, but he has periods of lunacy and it was to receive treatment under the expert guidance of Dr. Max Witte, superintendent of the state hospital here, that he took the action. He says his greatest trouble is in being unable to concentrate his mind so that he can retain a job—Globe Gazette.

NOTED HOG STEALING CASE IS ENDED

One Man Found Guilty But In Other Cases Evidence Is Not Sufficient.

News—The trial of Frank Graegert, charged with being an accomplice in the theft of the Senss hogs in Wall Lake township, ended Wednesday afternoon when the jury returned the verdict of "Not Guilty". The jury was convinced of Graegert's innocence and was out less than twenty minutes. Court followers of the trial could not foresee any other verdict in the case. There was no direct evidence tending to connect him with the crime. Circumstances surrounding the theft of the hogs tended to indicate that Graegert should have had knowledge of the action of Bishop and probably Payne, but he stoutly denied this and the state failed to produce any direct evidence which could reasonably connect him with the crime.

After the conclusion of the Graegert trial, Bishop was arraigned and entered a plea of guilty. He will receive sentence in the early part of the week. Payne, another employe of Graegert's, is now facing trial. Stronger circumstantial evidence is marshalled against him but it cannot be predicted with certainty that he will be found guilty of the charge. The testimony of Stockman Bige, who bought the seven hogs, proved a disappointment to the state in the Graegert trial, and will possibly prove as disappointing in the Payne case.

The Frank Graegert trial was concluded Wednesday morning, the arguments beginning before noon and concluding in the afternoon. The evidence against Graegert charged with stealing hogs from Edward Senss, Wall Lake, rested solely on circumstantial evidence. Bishop, his brother-in-law, was arrested at Hampton while attempting to dispose of eight Spotted Poland sows. There he said he was marketing the hogs under orders from Graegert. Graegert's truck had been used to haul the hogs to Hampton. Payne, an uncle of Graegert, charged with the same offense, is believed to have marketed hogs in Webster City.

Stockbuyer Bige of Webster City swore that he had bought seven head of hogs Monday, after Senss' hogs had disappeared Sunday night, but while at the grand jury he declared he could identify the man who had sold them, in court he said he could not do this. A ficticious name was given by the stranger who sold the hogs to him, it is charged.

The state sought to prove that the nature of the circumstances were such that Graegert had guilty knowledge if not actual participation in the thefts.

Miss Herring school teacher boarding at the Graegert home, swore that in the night she heard two persons go down stairs. Graegert swore he was in bed with his wife thru the night, and Mrs. Graegert likewise swore that he was at her side thru the night.

Monday morning Graegert went to Webster City to have a tooth treated. He flatly denies any knowledge of the theft of the Senss hogs. Bishop's guilt in the theft is unquestioned. Payne's part in the theft is supported by circumstantial evidence which is more convincing than that presented against Graegert.

The state sought to prove that Graegert was implicated in the theft, for it would have been impossible for the two men working for him to have driven the hogs to his barn yard and loaded them up in his truck and wagon without help.

The sale of seven hogs at Webster City, to Mr. Bige, corroborates Mr. Senss' story. He lost fifteen head

THIEVES ENTER FIVE BUSINESS PLACES FRI.

Get But Little For Their Efforts —Two Places Entered At Goodell Same Night.

Unknown thieves last Friday night entered five different business establishments in Belmond and took what came handy in the way of money. The M. & St L. depot, Belmond Motor Sales, City Market, Bohning & Co. and Standard Oil Filling station were the places visited. The thieves, however, failed to secure but little in the way of cash, getting about $20 in all from all five places.

The robbery took place between midnight and six in the morning. In all cases the thieves used a pinch bar to pry open the doors of each place visited, going in the front door at each place.

The only places where it is known they secured money was at the depot and the City Market. The same night two places were entered at Goodell, a hardware store and general store being entered there. At the Thada general store the thieves were frightened away by Mr. Thada, who was sleeping upstairs and who awoke and heard them.

No clews have been found as to the identity of the robbers, By some it is thought it was local talent, while others believe they were from another town. The robbery at Goodell tends to strengthen the latter theory.

BELMOND SCHOOL NOTES

The boys' basket ball team went to Kanawha, Friday night for their last game before the tournament. The first team easily outplayed their opponents and soon had a lead of several points, so Coach Pals let the second team finish the game. Even the Kanawha fans cheered our midget player, Kenneth Nourse. The final score was 27 to 10.

Friday of this week the basket ball teams go to Britt to play in the first series of the state tournament. The winners of this tournament will play the winners of other sectional tournanents a week later. We are depending on our boys to win the Britt tournament. The drawing for pairings for the first round will take place Thursday night.

Friday evening the three declamatory contestants who won first place in the home contest will go to Kanawha to speak in the preliminary contest for the state series. The winners at Kanawha speak in the sub-district contest two weeks later. Our contestants at Kanawha Friday night will be:

Oratorical, Alfred Wilkinson.
Dramatic, Kathleen Barry.
Humorous, Bernetas Wolle.

Division 1 of the Literary society gave a very original and interesting program, Friday afternoon.

Supt. Guthrie was ill Thursday and Friday of last week.

Miss Jewell, of the Commercial Department, and Miss Rohrback, of the fifth grade, were back at work Monday.

This is the end of the six week period so tests are going on this week. Report cards will be out next week.

Many are still suffering from grippe and colds, altho there are not so many out of school.

It is understood that the trial of Guy Bates, scheduled to appear before district court on Tuesday where he appealed on the charge of drunkeness some time ago, was not held owing to the non-appearance of Bates. Jack Finn and S. S. Packard who went his bonds, have been hunting him at Mason City and other points. Unless he is found in a few days, they will have to forfeit his bond, one hundred dollars.

BERT TRUMBELL

Bert Trumbell, son of Mr. and Mrs. Chas Trumbell, was born at Belmond, Iowa, May 21, 1902.

His mother died July 28 1902 leaving Bert with no remembrance of her. His grandmother, Mrs. J. W. Brooks, took him to her home and was a faithful and kind mother to him, up until the time of his death.

Bert was not strong physically, but possessed a very keen intellect, and through his whole school life, stood high in his class work. He graduated from the Belmond High School in June, 1920. After graduating from high school he took a business course at Des Moines, and then entered the business world for himself.

Though meeting many difficulties in life, he always demonstrated a high degree of hopefullness and self reliance, working during all his vacations while attending school, in order that he might finish.

He was stricken with Pneumonia while at work in Des Moines, and died at the Congregational Hospital on Monday, February 19, 1923, at the age of 20 years, 9 months and 28 days and was buried at Goodell, Iowa, Wednesday, February 21st, 1923.

Thus another young life has gone from among us, and one that will be missed. Not in the sense of the passing of an old man, but because of the sterling, manly qualities of his young life. To those of us who knew him well, we love to remember the kind self-sacrificing quality of his life in his relation to his grandmother, with whom he lived. Though short, we feel his life was well spent.

The deceased leaves to mourn his loss his father, Chas. Trumbell, of Stockton, Calif.; four sisters, Iva (Mrs. Chas. Courter) in California; Iris and Wilma, at Belmond, Iowa; his grandparents Mrs James Brooks and Mr. and Mrs. C. R. Trumbell; besides aunts and uncles and innumerable friends.

The funeral services were conducted at the Methodist Episcopal Church in Klemme by the Rev. A. B. Gedye, pastor, assisted by Rev. W. A. Wilkinson, of Belmond; and interment being made in the Cemetery at Goodell, Iowa.

(It was the privilege of the editor to have known and to have been an intimate friend of, Bert Trumbell, for many years. From his youngest school days to the time of his death, he was one of our best friends, and possibly we knew him as few of his associates did. Bert was a true gentleman in every sense of the word. His life was clean and wholesome, his character one of unselfishness and devotion to those dear to him. He was as true to his friends as the sun to the skies, and there was nothing he would not do for them. Of unsuual brilliancy of mind his physical strength unequal to his ambition, the struggle to carve a position in life weakened him so that he could not meet the great test. Bert fought the good fight. He left the world a little beter because he had been here, and his life, while short, was not in vain.)

JOINS KLU KLUX KLAN

The following item appeared in the Hampton Chronicle last week, under a Cedar Rapids date line, and will be of much interest to Belmond people:

Tom Roberts, pastor of the Baptist church at Sheffield and prominent in the American Legion in Iowa, and a former state chaplain of that organization will become a lecturer for the Ku Klux Klan, local representatives of the "invisible empire" said today.

Roberts' decision is said to have been given after a special meeting of the Klan here last week, attended by white robed delegates from Des Moines, Waterloo, Boone, Clinton, Anamosa and Iowa City, and Allen E. Brown of Washington, D. C., imperial representative of the king kleagle of Iowa.

In Mr. Robert's statement he declares he will endeavor to tell his friends in Iowa and elsewhere that the Ku Klux Klan is not a "bunch of night riders and outlaws, but is composed of loyal American citizens, espousing the noble principles of pure Americanism."

Roberts declares, according to the printed statement, that the principles of the klan and of the American Legion are parallel.

BUYS OUT BARBER SHOP

A deal was completed last week Saturday whereby Geo. Goelz purchased the barber business and equipment of Eugene Sullivan located in the Lathrop hall, possession being taken at once. George who has been conducting the barber shop at the Case Hotel, has moved his shop to the Lathrop hall where he is now running the combined business of the two shops.

The annual meeting of the Belmond Co-operative Shipping Association will be held at the Belmond Township hall on Thursday next March 8 at 2:30 p. m. Election of officers for the ensuing year will take place, and other business pertaining to the association will be transacted.

2,000 Acres Have Been Signed Up

One-Third Of Acreage Already Signed Up And March Expected To Increase It.

WANT 5,000 TO 6,000 ACRES

The Iowa Valley Operating Co. is coming along very nicely with the campaign for 1923, and have signed up at this writing some two thousand acres of beets for this year. These contracts are said to be on some of the best land in this vicinity and a bumper crop is anticipated for the season.

Signing of 2,000 acres to date is a rather remarkable achievement inasmuch as contracts have never been very largely secured in the month of February. As it is hoped to secure from 5,000 to 6,000 acres this year, it means that one-third of the acreage has already been secured. The month of March is always a better month, owing to so many changes taking place on farms the first, for securing beet contracts, and the company expects, to greatly increase the acreage in the next 30 days. Beets are a sure crop, where the minimum price is assured before the crop is planted, and a large majority of those who raised beets last year are again contracting. Notably among these is the tenant on the F. H. Frohling land east of Belmond, who has signed again. That he made good money as well as his landlord, is evidenced by the fact that Mr. Frohling received as rent on his land last year $26. per acre.

The contract being offered is the same 50-50 contract as was used last year, a contract which is said to be the most fair ever offered the grower. It assures him the highest possible price for his beets, and guarantees a minimum below which it cannot go.

The company is greatly desirous of securing a larger acreage this year, and confidently expects to get it. The officials state, however, that it is essential that contracts be signed early, thus giving them an opportunity to secure the best labor obtainable instead of taking what they can get later on. It is understood that the company has a number of applicants from married men who wish to raise beets and any landlord who is not able to put in beets himself but wishes to raise them, can probably secure the help by communicating with the company.

Belmond is hoping that the necessary acreage is secured and another successful campaign put thru. The result of what sugar beets mean to business was shown last fall when ready cash was turned loose in the community by the farmers who had raised beets. Old accounts which were ready to be charged off as a loss were paid, bills were paid more promptly, and a noticable pick-up in business was evident. With 2,000 acres now signed up the prospects for a successful campaign this year are bright.

THE RIGHT IDEA

The Independent is in receipt of a nifty little illustrated booklet issued by the Iowa Falls Electric Co., and entited "Back of the Push Button." The booklet is illustrated by pictures of various towns served by the company, and some of the buildings and equipment of the concern. It contains some interesting data and figures regarding various towns, the service, and the company's growth, and is being sent out to acquaint their customers with the property and general scope of the service, the company is furnishing. The Iowa Falls company has the right idea, in issuing this booklet and in their advertising campaign now being carried on in the newspapers. The more a public utility informs the public of its business; the more it shows them how and why the wheels go 'round, the better opinion the public will have of it and the less suspicion and distrust. With a friendly spirit built up, any differences which may arise will be far more easily settled. And a friendly public spirit is worth more to a public-serving corporation then all the time and money it may take to create it. We venture to say that beyond any question, the Iowa Falls Electric Co. will find that advertising pays.

SCHOOL ELECTION

The second Monday in March, the 19th is the date for election of school officials. Two directors are to be chosen, to succeed Wallace Ramsey and A. L. Luick, and a treasurer to succeed C. O. Fitts. The terms are for three years on each office. Candidates should be getting lined up.

WHAT OF 1923?

Every prospect for 1923 is seemingly bright. All forcasts by the financial wizards, the big business men of he country, are that the pendalum has started on the upward swing, and that business every day in every way will be better and better. It is freely declared that better times are here, and that this year will be the best since the big smash. Prices on farm products are coming back; the farmer has more ready money, and this means better business for us all. For as the farmer prospers we all benefit.

These things being true, what of 1923 for Belmond? Shall we not take advantage of the times, and start the move to place Belmond back where it was a few years ago, a good large dot on the map of Iowa known from one end to the other as a live town, a fine town, and a good place to do business and to live? This is an appeal to every business man of Belmond in general, and to the Chamber of Commerce in particular, to get busy. Gentlemen, can you give any valid reason why it can't be done? The cry has been the past few years that times would not permit of many activities. Granting this, then, the times are changing. Are you going to change with them? Can you give any good reason why Belmond should not look alive this year?

The Chamber of Commerce has not held a meeting for two years. It has not done a single thing that would enliven the community. Last year we muddled along; this year will we do the same? There are many things which can be done; many that should be looked after. Why not do them?

The Independent is not throwing bricks at the officers of the Chamber of Commerce for not doing anything; it is granted that the times would have made activity pretty difficult. But the times are changing, and this paper feels that the officers, or the Chamber, should look alive in 1923, and that the time to start is NOW! There should be a meeting called, the new officers chosen, and an effort at least made to be worthy the name. And it should be done now, not sometime. It is greatly doubted whether two dozen business men could be gathered at a meeting, but if there was any indication to look alive, the next meeting would bring them and find them ready to co-operate. The spirit of the Chamber is dead, or at best deeply sleeping, and it will require hard work to liven it up. But it can be done, and now is the time to do it.

When is that meeting going to be held, gentlemen? And what are you going to do? Nothing but a complete reorganization will be worth while. Are you willing to do it? If you aren't, don't call a meeting and give the crabs of the community another chance to say "I told you so." If you are, then get busy, and for one, the Independent promises you its most hearty support, morally, financially, and by real honest-to-gosh work.

Will you do the same?

HERE AND THERE

The town council purchased a siren last week for use as a fire alarm and such other purpose as is needed.

The old bell, which is all the alarm our litte city has at present passed its days of usefulness some time ago. Our residents who live on the edge of town are unable to hear it and it is also necessary at present for anyone wishing to sound an alarm to go to the power house to do so, while with the siren it will be arranged so that it will be possible to turn in a fire or other alarm from different places.

It will be fine thing for our town and we are glad the council made the investment.—Reporter.

He is a fool who sits and pines
While other men push along,
Who thinks that his lines are the hardest lines,
And croons a pitiful song.
He is a fool who sighs, "Ah me,
I've arrived at the world too late,"
But the worst fool in the world is he
Who nurses hate.
He is a fool, no matter how high,
Who fancies that when he dies
No other may worthily occupies.
No other may worthily occupy
He is a fool who claims to be
Foredoomed to the scorn of Fate,
But the worst fool under the sun is he
Who nurses hate.
There was never a man who nursed a wrong
Intending to scourge his foe,
Unless he dragged future sorrow along
And aided to future woe.
The anger we foster is sure to be
Remorse for us soon or late;
And the worst fool under the sun is he

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Graff Addresses Board of Directors

E. F. Graff, district county agent leader from Ames, addressed the members of the board of directors of the Wright County Farm Bureau at their regular monthly meeting in the county agent's office last Saturday afternoon, February 24th.

Mr. Graff is sent out by the state federation office in an effort to organize the work throughout the state in such a way that there shall be a closer cooperation between the different county farm bureaus on subjects which are of vital importance to the farmers of the entire state. He spent much time in explaining to our directors the importance of attending the regular board of director meetings in order to keep in close touch with the activities of the organization. He urged, also, the necessity of the individual members keeping the directors informed as to what their wishes are regarding their problems at home. His visit to Wright county was for the special purpose of assisting the county agent and directors in setting up the spring membership drive which has been set for Thursday and Friday, March 8th and 9th.

Spring Membership Drive March 8th and 9th.

At their last regular meeting on Saturday afternoon, February 24th, the directors of the Wright County Farm Bureau voted to conduct a spring membership drive for the purpose of getting new members who have moved into the county March 1st. Heretofore the drive for members has been in the fall of the year, thus allowing no opportunity for the newcomers on March 1st to get into our organization.

Arrangements have been made for conducting a county-wide membership campaign and a team consisting of two or three men and the same number of ladies has been appointed in each township to carry on the work and to solicit the farmers who have moved into our county March 1st as well as the old residents who have never become members of the organization.

The farm bureau as a county, state and national organization is dedicated to agriculture and every farmer regardless of membership in the farm bureau or any other farm organization is benefitted either directly or indirectly by this organization. With this fact in mind, the solicitors will call upon the non-members and give them opportunity to join hands with those who have been carrying the burden for the past few years. The farm bureau has passed the experiment stage and is now in reality a working machine, a mouth piece, so to speak, through which the farmers are able to make their wishes known to the other interests of our great county.

County Agent to Inspect Baby Beeves

Baby beeves which are being fed by boys and girls who are members of the Baby Beef club are being inspected this week by the county agent who is calling at these youngster's farms to check up on the feeding operations.

A fine bunch of calves are on feed and the youngsters who are carrying on this work seem to be quite enthusiastic about it. Some of the boys and girls who signed up in the Baby Beef club have surprised themselves by the results they are getting in feeding their calves. Some very good gains are being made by the calves on feed and if they continue with the rapid gains made in the past few weeks there will no doubt be some pretty keen competition when the county-wide club show is held next summer. The Baby Beef club seems to be gaining in popularity amongst the boys and girls of the county and a great many have already signed up for next year.

Social at Waterman's School

Farmers of Wall Lake township met at the Waterman school, district number 9, last Tuesday evening for the monthly meeting of the Wall Lake Township Farm Bureau.

A lively meeting, which was arranged by Mrs. Floyd Bubeck, vice-director of the township farm bureau, and a willing corps of committee members was given at this meeting. A real honest to goodness community social was held and the little schoolhouse was packed so full that a few of the late comers were forced to stand outside the door. The program consisted of two short plays arranged by the local teacher, several recitations a few special musical numbers and a short talk by the county agent.

The people of Wall Lake township have been holding their regular monthly meetings during the winter months and seem to have enjoyed their home talent entertainment. These people seem to have the faculty of drawing upon their local talent for their own entertainment. They surely believe in and practice community cooperation.

Appropriation For Tuberculosis

The proposed change in our state law which provides for the payment of indemnity for cattle which react to the tuberculin test is causing considerable agitation among the livestock breeders of Wright county as well as many others throughout the state.

The law as it stands provides for the payment of indemnity for reactor cattle on the basis of the appraised value while the new law, if it becomes effective, provides for the payment of indemnity on the basis of their valuation as made by the township assesors which is usually about one-fourth their market value. The proposed change in the law would work a great hardship upon the livestock farmers of our county because the basis of valuation would be unjust as between grades and purebreds as well as between common and good cows. Purebred cattle, especially are not assessed anywhere near their real value and if the purebred business is to be encouraged in our county it would seem that this discriminating payment of indemnity should not be adopted.

Under the system which is now in force the state provides that the owner of the re-actor cattle, which are slaughtered under the state-federal plan which received one-third of the difference between the proceeds for the sale of salvage which the owner receives and the appraised breeding value of the animal. A maximum amount of $80.00 is set as the amount which may be paid for any pure-bred animal and $40.00 for grade. The maximum amount which can be paid by the federal government for a pure-bred is $50.00 and $25.00 for a grade. Indemnity can be received by the cattle owner only when their herds are tested under the accredited agreement.

The annual state appropriation of $250,000 for tuberculosis eradication has been increased and an appropriation of $500,000 is being sought this year for this important work. According to a report just received from the state federation there are now 4500 herds on the waiting list and over 13,000 applications for testing on file in the state office. Many of our farmers have waited from one to three years for the T. B. testing under this system and are still waiting. Many of our farmers have not applied for the test thinking that there was little chance when so many were on the waiting list. Considerable sentiment has been created throughout Iowa in favor of the area plan of testing in which system the county rather than the state, would carry on the work. Under this system the testing of all herds would continue until all catte of the county are free from tuberculosis. The area plan is being followed with great success in Michigan, New York, and Minnesota and two counties of Iowa, Winnebago and Shelby, have tried the plan and have made thorough individual action by the county farm bureau. The great number of cattle could be tested in a given time and with less expense than under the accredited herd plan because the tester could go from one farm to the next avoiding the loss of time and travel between the different herds. As far as the cost is concerned, the testing under the area plan would be just about half what it is under the old system.

The importance which is attached to the eradication of tuberculosis from our herds seems to warrant the most careful consideration on the part of our legislature in whatever action they take on this matter. It would seem that our farmers, particularly our livestock breeders, should make an effort to see that this important matter receives due consideration when it comes up for discussion in our state legislature. In fact it might be well for our interested farmers to write their senator and representative expressing their wishes in this connection.

COURT HOUSE NOTES

But Bige testified the hogs were red and black animals, whereas Senss' hogs were Spotted Polands.

In the Thiebay-Thiebay divorce suit, filed by Art Thiebay of Eagle Grove against his wife, Ella Thiebay, defendant defaults. This case will come to trial at this term.

In the suit of Mrs. Ethel Beach against Frank Beach for divorce, plaintiff failed to establish her case and her petition was denied. She alleged cruel and inhuman treatment, which was supposed to have consisted, in the defendant's frequent swearing at her but the court found this insufficient cause for a divorce.

The case for L. Harbach Sons Co. against the Jackson Furniture Co., in bankrupty, and also the claim of J. B. Putman, were disallowed.

A. R. Woodley was appointed as guardian of the person and property of John Johnson, insane, and bond fixed at $12,000.

In the criminal action against Gayl Pepper and Elmer Haynes, charged with theft of furs, the boys asked for separate trials, which the court granted.

A jury consisting of Jim Dunden, will Corsair, Bert Hiams, Johanna Graves, Esther Derscheid, Ole Scott Ocar Nelson, J. C. Dahlgren, Louis Shaw, W. L. Damerow, Ole Burg and Jennie Stella were chosen Friday to hear the evidence against George Kiester and Harry Weeks who were tried in justice court at Goldfield, charged with petty larceny, and who appealed to the district court from a $100 fine.

Before this case was brot to trial, the defendants attorneys filed a motion asking for a directed verdict in favor of the defendants, and the court sustained the motion. It seems the boys were originally arrested, charged with grand larceny and that at the time of their trial in justice court, the charge was changed to petit larceny, and because of this fact, their arraignment in district court was illegal. There seems to be a doubt as to the actual guilt of the two boys, and further action against them will probably not be taken. The other boys, who were charged with the thefts and fined, are paying their fine in installments.

Elmer T. Larson has filed a petition in district court asking that the estate of the late Gomelia Severeide be sold and the proceeds divided among the heirs according to their inheritance rights. Louis A. Larson, Eben O. Larson, Ronald Severeide and Myrthe Severeide are co-heirs.

The United States government has filed notice of tax lien against J. T. Johnson of Eagle Grove, in the sum of $225.06, plus a five per cent penalty and one per cent per month interest until paid.

Charles Johnson is suing B. D. Springer to collect on a past due note for $115.85.

The Farmers State bank of Dows asking the court to foreclose a certain real estate mortgage in which Theresa J. Stewart and Burr A. Stewart are defendants. A total of more than $7,000 is due. An injunction restraining defendants from cutting timber off farm is also asked.

It's difficult to believe in this day and age that anyone won't grab the last dime if he can get it, but we are forced to hand it to Cato C. Griesy for his ad this week in the Independent. Cato believes in sharing a good thing with his friends, and is refusing to take advantage of a raise in the price of farm implements. He contracted at lower prices and is offering the saving due to his foresight, to the farmers, offering implements 10 per cent below present prices. It just goes to prove again that Cato is a good business man.

Griesy's Store News

Vol. 1 BELMOND, IOWA, MARCH 1, 1923. No. 49.

What About Implement Prices?

THERE is no question that the advance in the cost of both labor and material justify an advance in the price of farm implements by the manufacturers.

Our viewpoint, however, is different. We contracted for our requirements for this season before prices advanced and believe that the farmer should have the benefit of these contracts.

With this in view we wish to announce that we will sell all of our implements at practically 10 per cent below the present market prices as long as we have a single machine left.

We will accept orders now for future delivery, guaranteeing against decline and with privilege of taking cash discount on delivery.

It will pay you to talk with Griesy before buying.

HINTS FOR THE HOUSEWIFE

Cleaning stoves—Once each week coal and wood stoves should be cleaned inside in order to save heat and fuel. The soot should be brushed from the bottom of the lids and all clinging ashes removed; the flues, especially those under and on top of the oven, should also be cleaned regularly. Wick cleaners can be obtained for cleaning the wicks of oil stoves. If this is done daily the flame will not get yellow and smoke up your kettles. If you don't care to black your stove while it is in use in winter, apply some kerosene or a lubricating oil with a soft, thick polishing cloth. This does not give any shine to the stove surface, but it keeps the top clean and free from rust.

Save your clothes by applying these rules, have hangers for all dresses and coats and use them every day. Keep the hooks, snaps and buttons sewed on. Rework worn buttonholes; watch plackets for ripped stitchings; straighten a skirt hem when it begins to sag; use adjustable collar and cuffs which may be freshened frequently; save your dresses from soil by using a thin lining tacked in the waists; they may be removed often and wahed. Mend rips and tears immediately.

Banana Sherbert—Boil 1 pt. each of sugar and water 10 minutes; stir hot into the beaten whites of 2 eggs, then add ½ cup lemon juice and mashed pulp of 6 bananas. Strain, cool and freeze.

Rice Dainty—1 cup cooked rice, ¼ cup cooked fruit, 1 cup powdered sugar, 1 cup cream. Mix rice, fruit, sugar together, then fold in whipped cream and serve, garnish with fruit.

Cut glass keeps its original luster and sparkle it washed in soap suds to which amonia is added. The inside of a vase can be washed easily if some bird shot or a few buttons and soapy water are placed inside. Shake gently and the scum, or strain is removed quickly.

ONE REASON WHY SOME TOWNS NEVER PROGRESS

A dry goods merchant was starting down town when his wife reminded him of his most important duty during the day; "Now, my dear be sure and send to the city for that new radio outfit, so we can have it for Sunday. You know our old victrola is getting so that it is not fit to be heard."

Just a few blocks away the merchant who handles victrolas and furniture was sitting at breakfast with his family. The conversation dritted to around the near approach of school, "And that reminds me, John," said the lady, who sat at the head of the table, "I must be going to the city not later than next week. I must get school clothes and see about a fall suit for myself, and while there perhaps I had better see about new lace curtains for the front windows."

An hour or two later a leading grocer stepped into the bank to buy a draft which he was going to send to a catalogue house for a swell bedroom suit.

"How's business?" asked the banker. "Oh, not so very good," replied the grocer; "things are dull just now."

Before the banker finished writing the draft a dapper young man with a grip stepped up and asked how everything was. The banker seemed glad to see him. He was a representative of a big printing establishment in another state. He and the banker chatted pleasantly for a few minutes, after which the young man inquired casually of his friends behind the window if he wanted anything. "Well, yes," replied the banker. "I believe I do. Print us 5,000 drafts, 5,000 checks and a couple thousand letter heads."

The young man thanked his friend cordially and hustled out.

That night the local business men had a meeting at the town hall to discuss the growth of the mail order evil. All the gentlemen mentioned in the narrative delivered short talks. They agreed that the farmers were guilty of treason to their home merchants when they persisted in buying their goods from mail order houses, and the meeting closed by adopting strong resolutions against trading away from home.

The newpaper starts in
When you are born,
Relates about your excellence
And tells about your sweetness.
It follows you to school,
And prints the honor roll
If your name is found there
It tells of your graduation
And speaks of the excellence
Of your magnificent essay;
It tells of your progress
During your college career
And then dilates much about
The choice of your location.
Then it gives a nice notice
About your marriage
And praises up the blushing bride
Till her kinsfolk don't know her,
Then in due course of events,
It tells about the bouncing baby
That happens in your family—
Thereby beginning its like work
All over and over again.
The newspaper does all this
And it does also much more
It tells of the progress
Made by city and county
And boosts all enterprises;
Gives free advertising
Worth thousands of dollars
To its own home town.
There are scads of things
That all good newspapers do
For which they cannot be paid
That is why every citizen
Should do his darndest
To support the newspaper
In every possible way
And all the time.
Yassum.

Willing to do Her Share

A large and dark lady was being married to an equally dark but several sizes smaller groom.

"Clarissa," asked the preacher, following the usual formula, "do you take this man to be your wedded husband, for better or worse—"

"Jes' as he is pahson, jes' as he is," interrupted Clarissa. "Ef he get any better de good Lawd's gwine take him, an' ef he gets any wuss Ah reckon Ah kin tend to him mahself."

Deferred Ambition

"They say the ex-Kaiser still bosses the house after being married."

"Must be something to this war lord stuff after all."

Just Begun to Fight

Sam unfortunately had picked out an unusually combative helpmeet. After three days of married life he returned to his job looking somewhat wilted and woebegone. His employer, knowing the circumstances, sought to joke with him.

"Sam," he said seriously. "You look as if you'd been in a battle."

"Yo' jes' bet Ah has, boss," replied Sam ruefully. "But dat ain' de wuss of it. Ah 'pears to have gone and mar'ied mahself to de whole World Wah!"

She Had Plans

At a certain girls' school they do not allow the pupils to drive out with men unless there is a near relationship between them, or unless there is an engagement in prospect.

A girl asked permission to take a drive with a young man.

"Is he your father, brother or cousin?"

"No, ma'am."

"Are you engaged to him?"

"No, ma'am, but I expect to be before we get back."

A grocer in a New England town went to a deputy sheriff whose word he knew he could trust for information as to a certain Lew Diggs who had applied for credit at his store.

"Good mornin' sheriff."

"Mornin'."

"You know Lew Diggs?"

"Yup."

"What kind of a feller is he?"

"Purty fair."

"Is he honest?"

Oh, sure, I should say so. Been arrested twice for stealing and acquitted both times."

Progress

"What," inquired the literary editor, "has become of the poet who used to write a sonnet to milady's eyebrows?"

"Him?" said the dramatic critic. "He's turning out snappy jazz about her shoulders now."

Marriage is a thing that brings a lot of change into a man's life—but it takes a lot more out of his pocket.

LEGISLATURE IS GONE ON A RECESS

(By G. L. Caswell.)

Des Moines, March 1, 1923.—Adjourned for the usual first of March recess of ten days the Fortieth General Assembly probably has a record of less bills for acts introduced than the average session up to this time as well as a record for less measures passed or acted upon.

Counting out the Code Commission bills which were introduced at the beginning of the session and numbered from one to 262, the senators have introduced about 340 new measures, while the representatives have outrun them in that respect about fifty, making just about 700 bills altogether introduced in both bodies during the first half of the session. Many of these bills are duplicates in each house, so that probably not more than 450 entirely new measures aside from Code Commission bills have been offered at this session. This is a very conservative record and indicates that members have listened to the oft-repeated assertion that "there are too many laws already."

Of the measures introduced thus far, a great many have been put to sleep so far as this session is concerned by the committees which considered them or by vote of either House or Senate. Very few important measures, indeed, have been favorably acted upon, while some important matters have gone down in defeat. There seems to be a disposition in the Senate to kill some measures that the House has considered favorably, and the reverse will be true on some good Senate measures. The majority in each house is of a different trend of mind than the other.

While it has seemed that Code revision bills have been neglected and relegated to the rear at this session, it is likely that more of them have been passed and become part of the laws of the state than any other legislation so far.

Appropriation Bills Come Next

When the members return from their vacation after March 6th, appropriation bills will be the important consideration of both houses. Up to March 1st the rule has been that no appropriation bills should be acted upon, excepting emergency measures. But one emergency has been great enough as yet to get one through, the House having passed one for rebuilding the armory at Ames that was burned.

With several millions of dollars involved in the special appropriation measures already in the hands of committees there will be considerable more involved in the general appropriation bills that will be considered under the budget plan of providing for state needs. It is expected the idea of placing every department of state government under the budget plan will carry, and that hereafter no department can have or get a dollar more than the amount provided for its support during the biennial period between sessions. To get at the budget necessary, and pare the amounts down to the last needed dollar is the disposition of both House and Senate.

The Ways and Means Committees have much to say about what these budgets shall be and how the funds shall be provided for them. The members are open-minded and close mouthed on the subject however, which results in considerable anxiety among those concerned. The idea of a gasoline tax, some change in the automobile license schedules, an income tax, an amusement tax, a cigar and tobacco tax, increased corporation taxes, and all that still maintains and if members can agree there will before adjournment in April be passed on to the people of this state a lot of special taxes which will possibly relieve the general tax levies to some extent. With the sodiers' bonus tax and all, nobody looks for much if any decrease in the present millage levies for state purposes, but members hope they will not have to be increased.

A Mass of Highway Bills

Members of both houses are unable to keep track of the various highway bills and propositions that keep coming up day by day. So many of these bills have appeared that they would make a large book on highway construction and control. The ideas thus advanced for changing, altering, adding to or tearing down the system of highways in Iowa would become confusing. Nobody would believe so much of such legislation possible as is proposed.

To meet this emergency Chairman Holdoegel of the Senate Highways committee and Chairman Edson of the House Highways committee have each named a sub-committee of seven members to consider all the highway matters now before these committees, to co-ordinate the bills and eliminate the inconsistencies that would result in their passage, and if possible to recommend such legislation as will fit in with the ideas of those introducing the bills. It has been charged that these sub-committees have been "packed" with men of certain interests, but that would avail nothing, and even if true the whole membership of both houses may adopt or reject the highway committees' reports.

The sub-committee on highway bills named by Chairman Holdoegel for the Senate is composed of: Wichman of Hancock, Stoddard of Woodbury, Haskell of Linn, Shaff of Clinton, Scott of Marshall, Johnston of Lucas and Nelson of Cass.

The sub-committee of the House named by Chairman Edson of Buena Vista county is composed of: Henderson of Hamilton county, Storey of Warren, Saunders of Palo Alto, Moen of Lyon, Knudson of Cerro Gorde, Himebauch of Emmett and Brady of O'Brien.

House Highway Questionaire

These men have a real job ahead of them and from their efforts may come great good or harm to the general highway program of this General Assembly. Chairman Edson's questionaire to the members of the House Highways committee was the most illuminating thing brought out the past week. The committee voted 19 to 12 in favor of the appointment of a sub-committee as above. On the question of turning over to the state highway commission complete control of the primary road system the vote was 15 to 14 in favor of such proceeding. Of the whole committee 17 favored placing full control of the secondary roads in the hands of the county supervisors. By a vote of 17 to 11 the committee favored leaving the present schedule of automobile license fees as it now is. Eleven members favored a two-cent per gallon tax on gasoline and 12 were against that much tax. Seventeen favored dividing the gasoline tax evenly between the primry and secondary roads, to 7 against, and by a vote of 20 to 4 the committee favored giving a part of the gasoline tax to cities and towns. The committee also favored abolishing signs and bill boards on the highways and also abolishing the 25 per cent paving assessment now allowed against adjoining farms, while 21 to 3 were in favor of reducing such assessment.

In the Senate on Tuesday a real test battle on highway matters was disclosed when the Brookhart bill to eliminate highway engineers entirely or reduce their salaries to not more than that paid to county auditors was up. The bill was lost 19 to 28.

County Superintendents Saved

By a vote of 22 to 26 the Berry bill to make election of county superintendents by direct vote of the people as in years past, was defeated in the Senate Tuesday after the stormiest battle of the session. Senator Smith of Madison county offered his bill as a substitute and thus gave the bill more strength in the Senate than it would otherwise have had. The substitute called for election of county superintendents at the annual school elections held in March, when all other school officers are elected. He made a splendid presentation and defense of his proposition and got his substitute adopted in place of the original bill by a vote of 32 to 16 and then lost it on a vote on the main question. The present system will therefore remain indefinitely, as no further action along that line can come at this session.

At least one political boom was punctured during this school bill fight it is claimed by many Senators. The powerful state teachers' association and various other interests are aroused by the attacks made during the debate.

Senator Newberry has sponsored a very important bill to stop the sale of "imitation milk" in this state. It is the same as a bill in the U. S. Congress prohibiting the shipment of "filled milk" in interstate commerce. Filled milk is said to be milk from which the butter fat has been extracted and then a filling put in to make it look and have the substance of real milk, but which has no value. It is said to be sold by dealers cheaper than regular canned milk. If the bill passes, the dairy and food department will have a real and dangerous abuse to get after.

In the House a bitter fight took place Wednesday over a bill of questionable importance, to say the least. It was the bill of Representative Criswell of Boone requiring that the state educational board shall advertise for bids and let by contract all buildings erected by the state, or other contracts amounting to more than $2500. The bill was amended and discussed for hours and finally was so emasculated that its author would not recognize it and he voted to kill it. As finally passed the bill leaves the matter about where it was before—in the discretion of the state board of education.

When the General Assembly reconvenes on the 6th of March, there will still be three days in which to offer new bills, and it is expected there will be a flood of them. Then the real important work of the session will come, and the Fortieth G. A. will show whether it was worth while or not. The House has acted on a good many Code bills and its calendar is full of them yet. The Senate has not done so much in this line since February first. Whether the attempt at Code revision has thus been serious enough to meet the governor's approval is not known. Members are not speculating a great deal any more about a special session. A lot of them are ready to quit right where they are and let some other session revise the Code.

Soldiers' Bonus Will Stick

While the state supreme court has at this time given no decision regarding the validity of the soldiers' bonus law which was so strongly endorsed at the recent election state officials say that there is no doubt but that the law will be held constitutional and the validity of the bonds to be sold will be established. The decision may be out by the time this is printed. As to the rumor that an appeal will be taken to the U. S. supreme court, the same officials disclose that is impossible for the reason that Des Moines bankers interested in the sale of the bonds have induced the suit against the bond issue and have paid all expenses of court action up to this time. These bankers will not pay such expense any further, and as Ex-Senator Grout of Waterloo and others who brought the suit are not unfriendsly to the bond issue, but would like to see the veterans of the world war get their bonus speedily they are not going to put up money to carry the case to the U. S. supreme court, and nobody else will. Within the shortest possible time the bonds can be advertised for sale and disposed of legally, therefore, the twenty-two millions to be paid to the soldiers will be secured and paid out. It is figured this can be accomplished during the month of April.

Ford

Four Reasons Why You Should Buy Your Ford Car This Month

I.

The unprecedented demand for Ford Cars throughout the winter months has taken the entire output of the Ford plants working at capacity, indicating that the demand this Spring will be far in excess of the number of Ford Cars that can possibly be built.

II.

January was the tenth consecutive month in which retail deliveries exceeded 100,000 Ford Cars and Trucks. Requirements for February, the month when preparations are already under way for Spring business, called for 148,407 Cars and Trucks---more than 24,000 in excess of the number we can possibly produce.

III.

Ford dealers in many parts of the country are already finding it necessary to specify future delivery dates on Ford Products because there are no reserve stocks to draw from.

IV.

Your order placed now will protect you against delay or disappointment later on---It is the only way you can be assured of reasonably prompt delivery.

We consider it important to give you these facts, so that if you are planning to purchase a Ford Car, Truck or Fordson Tractor for use this Spring or Summer you can list your order at once and take advantage of our dealer's first opportunity to make delivery.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hilliard, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

CHAPTER VII.—Circumstances point to Eaton as Santoine's assailant.

CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on Warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Harriet Santoine to withhold judgment, telling her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers sufficiently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier requires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the position of a semi-prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.—Eaton meets a resident of the house, Wallace Blatchford, and a young girl, Mildred Davis, with whom apparently he is acquainted, though they conceal the fact. Eaton's mission is to secure certain documents which are vital to his interests, and his being admitted to the house is a remarkable stroke of luck. The girl agrees to aid him. He becomes deeply interested in Harriet Santoine, and she in him.

CHAPTER XII.—Harriet tells Eaton she and Donald Avery act as "eyes" to Santoine, reading to him the documents on which he bases his judgments. While walking with her, two men in an automobile deliberately attempt to run Eaton down. He escapes with slight injuries. The girl recognizes one of the men as having been on the train on which they came from Seattle.

"Yes; just at that time I was thrown from my horse, and could not do as much as I had been doing, so Mr. Avery was sent to Father."

"Then Mr. Avery was reading to him at the time you spoke of—the time of the Latron murder?"

"No; Mr. Avery came just afterward. I was reading to him at that time."

"The papers must have been a good deal for a girl of eighteen."

"At that time, you mean? They were; but Father dared trust no one else."

"Mr. Avery handles those matters now for your father?"

"The continuation of what was going on then? Yes; he took them up at the time I was hurt and so has kept on looking after them; for there has been plenty for me to do without that; and those things have all been more or less settled now. They have worked themselves out as things do, though they seemed almost unsolvable at the time. One thing that helped in their solution was that Father was able, that time, to urge what was just, as well as what was advisable."

"You mean that in the final settlement of them no one suffered?"

"No one, I think—except, of course, poor Mr. Latron; and that was a private matter not connected in any direct way with the question at issue. Why do you ask all this, Mr. Eaton?"

"I was merely interested in you—in what your work has been with your Father, and what it is," he answered quietly.

They had been following the edge of the road, she along a path worn in the turf, he on the edge of the road itself and nearer to the tracks of the motors. Suddenly she cried out and clutched at him. As they had stopped, she had heard the sound of a motor approaching them rapidly from behind. Except that this car seemed speeding faster than the others, she had paid no attention and had not turned. Instantaneously, as she had cried and pulled upon him, she had realized that this car was not passing; it was directly behind and almost upon him. She felt him spring to the side as quickly as he could; but her cry and pull upon him were almost too late; as he leaped, the car struck. The blow was glancing, not direct, and he was off his feet and in motion when the wheel struck; but the car hurled him aside and rolled him over and over.

As she rushed to Eaton, the two men in the rear seat of the car turned their heads and looked back, but without checking its speed or swerving, the car dashed on and disappeared down the roadway.

She bent over Eaton and took hold of him. He struggled to his feet and, dazed, tottered so that she supported him. As she realized that he was not greatly hurt, she stared with horror at the turn in the road where the car had disappeared.

"Why, he tried to run you down! He meant to! He tried to hurt you!" she cried.

"No," Eaton denied. "Oh, no, I don't think so. It must have been—an accident. He was—frightened when he saw what he had done."

"It wasn't at all like an accident!" she persisted. "It couldn't have been an accident there and coming up from behind the way he did! No; he meant to do it! Did you see who was in the car—who was driving?"

He turned to her quickly. "Who?" he demanded.

"One of the people who was on the train! The morning Father was hurt. Don't you remember—a little man, nervous, but very strong; a man almost like an ape?"

He shuddered and then controlled himself. "Yes, I remember a fellow the conductor tried to seat me opposite."

"This was the same man!"

Eaton shook his head. "That could hardly be; I think you must be mistaken."

"I am not mistaken; it was that man!"

"Still, I think you must be," he again denied.

She stared, studying him. "Perhaps I was," she agreed; but she knew she had not been. "I am glad, whoever it was, he didn't injure you. You are all right, aren't you?"

"Quite," he assured. "Please don't trouble about it, Miss Santoine."

They walked back rather silently, she appreciating how passionately she had expressed herself for him, and he quiet because of this and other thoughts too.

They found Donald Avery in front of the house looking for them as they came up. Eaton succeeded in walking without limping; but he could not conceal the marks on his clothes.

"Harriet, I've just come from your father; he wants you to go to him at once," Avery directed. "Good morning Eaton. What's happened?"

"Carelessness," Eaton deprecated. "Got rather in the way of a motor and was knocked over for it."

Harriet did not correct this to Avery. She went up to her father; she was still trembling, still sick with horror at what she had seen—an attempt to kill one walking at her side. She stopped outside her father's door to compose herself; then she went in.

The blind man was propped up on his bed with pillows into almost a sitting position; the nurse was with him.

"What did you want, Father?" Harriet asked.

He had recognized her step and had been about to speak to her; but at the sound of her voice he stopped the words on his lips and changed them into a direction for the nurse to leave the room.

He waited until the nurse had left and closed the door behind her. Harriet saw that, in his familiarity with her tones and every inflection of her voice, he had sensed already that something unusual had occurred; she repeated, however, her question as to what he wanted.

"That does not matter now, Harriet. Where have you been?"

"I have been walking with Mr. Eaton."

"What happened?"

She hesitated. "Mr. Eaton was almost run down by a motorcar."

"Ah! An accident?"

She hesitated again. "Mr. Eaton said it was an accident," she answered.

"But you?"

"It did not look like an accident, Father. It—it showed intention."

"You mean it was an attack?"

"Yes; it was an attack. The man in the car meant to run Mr. Eaton down; he meant to kill him or to hurt him terribly. Mr. Eaton wasn't hurt. I called to him and pulled him—he jumped away in time."

"To kill him, Harriet? How do you know?"

She caught herself. "I—I don't know, Father. He certainly meant to injure Mr. Eaton. When I said kill him, I was telling only what I thought."

"That is better. I think so too."

"That he meant to kill Mr. Eaton?"

"Yes."

She watched her father's face; often when relating things to him, she was aware from his expression that she was telling him only something he already had figured out and expected or even knew; she felt that now.

"Father, did you expect Mr. Eaton to be attacked?"

"Expect? Not that exactly; it was possible; I suspected something like this might occur."

"And you did not warn him?"

The blind man's hands sought each other on the coverlet and clasped together. "It was not necessary to warn him, Harriet; Mr. Eaton already knew. Who was in the car?"

"Three men."

"Had you seen any of them before?"

"Yes, one—the man who drove."

"Where?"

"On the train."

The color on Santoine's face grew brighter. "Describe him, dear."

He waited while she called together her recollections of the man.

"I can't describe him very fully, Father," she said. "He was one of the people who had berths in the forward sleeping car. I can recall seeing him only when I passed through the car—I recall him only twice in that car and once in the diner."

"That is interesting," said Santoine.

"What, Father?"

"That in five days upon the train you saw the man only three times."

"You mean he must have kept out of sight as much as possible?"

"Have you forgotten that I asked you to describe him, Harriet?"

She checked herself. "Height about five feet five," she said, "broad-shouldered, very heavily set; I remember he impressed me as being unusually muscular. His hair was black; I can't recall the color of his eyes; his cheeks were blue with a heavy beard closely shaved. I remember his face was prognathous, and his clothes were spotted with dropped food. I—it seems hard for me to recall him, and I can't describe him very well."

"But you are sure it was the same man in the motor?"

"Yes. He seemed an animal sort of person, small, strong, and not particularly intelligent. It seems hard for me to remember more about him than that."

"That is interesting."

"What?"

"That it is hard for you to remember him very well."

"Why, Father?"

Her father did not answer. "The other men in the motor?" he asked.

"I can't describe them. I—I was excited about Mr. Eaton."

"Thank you, dear. Bring Eaton to me."

"He has gone to his room to fix himself up."

"I'll send for him, then." Santoine pressed one of the buttons beside his bed to call a servant; but before the bell could be answered, Harriet got up.

"I'll go myself," she said.

She went out into the hall and closed the door behind her; she waited until she heard the approaching steps of the man summoned by Santoine's bell; then, going to meet him, she sent him to call Eaton in his rooms, and she still waited until the man came back and told her Eaton had already left his rooms and gone downstairs. She dismissed the man and went to the head of the stairs, but her steps slowed there and stopped. She knew that the blind man's thought in regard to Eaton had taken some immense stride; but she did not know what that stride had been, or what was coming now when her father saw Eaton.

She went on slowly down the stairs, and when halfway down, she saw Eaton in the hall below her. He was standing beside the table which held the bronze antique vase; he seemed to have taken something from the vase and to be examining it. She halted again to watch him; then she went on, and he turned at the sound of her footsteps. She could see, as she approached him, what he had taken from the vase, but she attached no importance to it; it was only a black button from a woman's glove—one of her own, perhaps, which she had dropped without noticing. He tossed it indifferently toward the open fireplace as he came toward her.

"Father wants to see you, Mr. Eaton," she said.

He looked at her intently for an instant and seemed to detect some strangeness in her manner and to draw himself together; then he followed her up the stairs.

CHAPTER XIII

It Grows Plainer.

Basil Santoine's bedroom was so nearly sound-proof that anything going on in the room could not be heard in the hall outside it, even close to the double doors. Eaton, as they approached these doors, listened vainly, trying to determine whether anyone was in the room with Santoine; then he quickened his step to bring him beside Harriet.

"One moment, please, Miss Santoine," he urged.

She stopped. "What is it you want?"

"Your father has received some answer to the inquiries he has been having made about me?"

"I don't know, Mr. Eaton."

"Is he alone?"

"Yes."

Eaton thought a minute. "That is all I wanted to know, then," he said.

Harriet opened the outer door and knocked on the inner one. Eaton heard Santoine's voice at once calling them to come in, and as Harriet opened the second door, he followed her into the room.

"Am I to remain, Father?" she asked.

"Yes," Santoine commanded.

Eaton waited while she went to a chair at the foot of the bed and seated herself—her clasped hands resting on the footboard and her chin upon her hands—in a position to watch both Eaton and her father while they talked; then Eaton sat down.

"Good morning, Eaton," the blind man greeted him.

"Good morning, Mr. Santoine," Eaton answered.

Santoine was lying quietly upon his back, his head raised on the pillows, his arms above the bed-covers, his finger-tips touching with the fingers spread.

"You recall, of course, Eaton, our conversation on the train," Santoine said evenly.

"Yes."

"I want to call your attention in a certain order to some of the details of what happened on the train. You had rather a close call this morning, did you not?"

"Rather, I was careless."

"You were careless?" Santoine smiled derisively. "Perhaps you were—in one sense. In another, however, you have been very careful, Eaton. You have been careful to act as though the attempt to run you down could not have been a deliberate attack; you were careful to call it an accident; you were careful not to recognize any of the three men in the motor."

"I had no chance to recognize any of them, Mr. Santoine," Eaton replied easily. "I did not see the car coming; I was thrown from my feet; when I got up, it was too far away for me to recognize anyone."

"Perhaps so; but were you surprised when my daughter recognized one of them as having been on the train with us?"

Eaton hesitated, but answered almost immediately:

"Your question doesn't exactly fit the case. I thought Miss Santoine had made a mistake."

"But you were not surprised; no. What would have been a surprise to you, Eaton, would have been—if you had had a chance to observe the men—to have found that none of them—none of them had been on the train!"

Eaton started and felt that he had colored. How much did Santoine know? Had the blind man received, as Eaton feared, some answer to his inquiries, which had revealed, or nearly revealed, Eaton's identity? Or was it merely that the attack made on Eaton that morning had given Santoine new light on the events that had happened on the train and particularly—Eaton guessed—on the cipher telegram which Santoine claimed to have translated.

"You assume that, Mr. Santoine," he asserted, "because—" He checked himself and altered his sentence. "Will you tell me why you assume that?"

"That that would have surprised you? Yes; that is what I called you in here to tell you."

As Santoine waited a moment before going on, Eaton watched him anxiously. The blind man turned himself on his pillows so as to face Eaton more directly.

"Just ten days ago," he said evenly and dispassionately, "I was found unconscious in my berth—Section Three of the rearmost sleeper—on the transcontinental train, which I had taken with my daughter and Avery at Seattle. I had been attacked—assailed during my sleep some time in that first night that I spent on the train—and my condition was serious enough so that for three days afterward I was not allowed to receive any of the particulars of what had happened to me. When I did finally learn them, I naturally attempted to make certain deductions as to who it was that had attempted to murder me, and why; and ever since, I have continued to occupy myself with those questions. I am going to tell you a few of my deductions. If you fancy I am at fault in my conclusions, wait until you discover your error."

Santoine waited an instant; Eaton thought it was to allow him to speak if he wanted to, but Eaton merely waited.

"The first thing I learned," the blind man went on, "was the similarity of the attack on me to the more successful attack on Warden, twelve days previous, which had caused his death. The method of the two attacks was the same; the conditions surrounding them were very similar. The desperate nature of the two attacks, and their almost identical method, made it practically certain that they originated at the same source and were carried out—probably—by the same hand and for the same purpose.

"Mrs. Warden's statement to me of her interview with her husband a half-hour before his murder, made it certain that the object of the attack on him was to 'remove' him. It seemed almost inevitable, therefore, that the attack on me must have been for the same purpose.

"I found that a young man—yourself—had acted so suspiciously both before and after the attack on me that both Avery and the conductor in charge of the train had become convinced that he was my assailant, and had segregated him from the rest of the passengers. Not only this, but—and this seemed quite conclusive to them—you admitted that you were the one who had called upon Warden the evening of his murder. It seemed likely, too, that you were the only person on the train aside from my daughter and Avery who knew who I was; for I had had reason to believe from the time when I first heard you speak when you boarded the train, that you were someone with whom I had previously, very briefly come in contact; and I had asked my daughter to find out who you were, and she had tried to do so, but without success."

Eaton wet his lips.

"Also," the blind man continued, "there was a telegram which definitely showed that there was some connection, unknown to me, between you and me, as well as a second—or rather a previous—suspicious telegram in cipher, which we were able to translate."

Eaton leaned forward, impelled to speak; but as Santoine clearly detected this impulse and waited to hear what he was going to say, Eaton reconsidered and kept silent.

"You Understand Already," Santoine Asserted.

"You were going to say something about that telegram in cipher?" Santoine asked.

"No," Eaton denied.

"I think you were; and I think that a few minutes ago when I said you were not surprised by the attempt made today to run you down, you were also going to speak of it; for that attempt makes clear the meaning of the telegram. Its meaning was not clear to me before, you understand. It said only that you were known and followed. It did not say why you were followed. I could not be certain of that; there were several possible reasons why you might be followed—even that the 'one' who 'was following' might be someone secretly interested in preventing you from an attack on me. Now, however, I know that the reason you feared the man who was following was because you expected him to attack you. Knowing that, Eaton—knowing that, I want to call your attention to the peculiarity of our mutual positions on the train. You had asked for and were occupying Section Three in the third sleeper, in order—I assume and, I believe, correctly—to avoid being put in the same car with me. In the night, the second sleeper—the car next in front of yours—was cut off from the train and left behind. That made me occupy in relation to the forward part of the train exactly the same position as you had occupied before the car ahead of you had been cut out. I was in Section Three in the third sleeper from the front."

Eaton stared at Santoine, fascinated; what had been only vague, half felt, half formed with himself, was becoming definite, tangible, under the blind man's reasoning. His hands closed instinctively, in his emotion. "What do you mean?"

"You understand already," Santoine asserted. "The attack made on me was meant for you. Someone stealing through the cars from the front to the rear of the train and carrying in his mind the location of Section Three in the third car, struck through the curtains by mistake at me instead of you. Who was that, Eaton?"

"I don't know," Eaton answered.

"You mean you prefer to shield him?"

"Shield him?"

"That is what you are doing, is it not? For, even if you don't know the man directly, you know in whose cause and under whose direction he murdered Warden—and why and for whom he is attempting to murder you."

Eaton remained silent.

In his intensity, Santoine had lifted himself from his pillows. "Who is that man?" he challenged. "And what is that connection between you and me which, when the attack found and disabled me instead of you, told him that—in spite of his mistake—his result had been accomplished? told him that, if I was dying, a repetition of the attack against you was unnecessary?"

Eaton knew that he had grown very pale; Harriet must be aware of the effect Santoine's words had on him, but he did not dare look at her now to see how much she was comprehending.

"I don't understand." He fought to compose himself.

"It is perfectly plain," Santoine said patiently. "It was believed at first that I had been fatally hurt; it was even reported at one time—I understand—that I was dead; only intimate friends have been informed of my actual condition. Yesterday, for the first time, the newspapers announced the certainty of my recovery; and today an attack is made on you. They did not hesitate to attack you in sight of my daughter."

"But—"

"You are merely challenging my deductions! Will you reply to my questions?—tell me the connection between us?—who you are?"

"No."

"Come here!"

"What?" said Eaton.

"Come here—close to me, beside the bed."

Eaton hesitated, and then obeyed.

"Bend over!"

Eaton stooped, and the blind man's hands seized him. Instantly Eaton withdrew.

"Wait!" Santoine warned. "If you do not stay, I shall call help." One hand went to the bell beside his bed.

Harriet had risen; she met Eaton's gaze warningly and nodded to him to comply. He bent again over the bed. He felt the blind man's sensitive fingers searching his features, his head, his throat. Eaton gazed at Santoine's face while the fingers were examining him; he could see that Santoine was merely finding confirmation of an impression already gained from what he had been told him about Eaton. Santoine showed nothing more than this confirmation; certainly he did not recognize Eaton. More than this, Eaton could not tell.

"Now your hands," Santoine ordered.

Eaton extended one hand and then the other; the blind man felt over them from wrists to the tips of the fingers; then he let himself sink back against the pillows, absorbed in thought.

"You may go," Santoine said at last.

"Go?" Eaton asked.

"You may leave the room. Blatchford will meet you downstairs."

Santoine reached for the house telephone beside his bed—receiver and transmitter on one light bar—and gave directions to have Blatchford await Eaton in the hall below.

Eaton was distinctly frightened by the revelation he just had had of Santoine's clear, implacable reasoning regarding him; for none of the blind man's deductions about him had been wrong—all had been the exact, though incomplete truth. It was clear to him that Santoine was close—much closer even than Santoine himself yet appreciated—to knowing Eaton's identity; it was even probable that one single additional fact—the discovery, for instance, that Miss Davis was the source of the second telegram received by Eaton on the train—would reveal everything to Santoine. And Eaton was not certain that Santoine, even without any new information, would not reach the truth unaided at any moment. So Eaton knew that he himself must act before this happened. But so long as the safe in Santoine's study was kept locked or was left open only while someone was in the room with it, he could not act until he had received help from outside; and he had not yet received that help; he could not hurry it or even tell how soon it was likely to come.

As his mind reviewed, almost instantaneously, these considerations, he glanced again at Harriet; her eyes, this time, met his, but she looked away immediately. As he went toward the door, she made no move to accompany him. He went out without speaking and closed the inner and the outer doors behind him; then he went down to Blatchford.

For several minutes after Eaton had left the room, Santoine thought in silence.

"Where are you, Harriet?" he asked at last.

She knew it was not necessary to answer him, but merely to move so that he could tell her position; she moved slightly, and his sightless eyes shifted at once to where she stood.

"How did he act?" Santoine asked.

She reviewed swiftly the conversation, supplementing his blind apperceptions of Eaton's manner with what she herself had seen.

"What have been your impressions of Eaton's previous social condition, Daughter?" he asked. "You have talked with him, been with him—both on the train and here: have you been able to determine what sort of people he has been accustomed to mix with? Have his friends been business men? Professional men? Society people?"

The deep and unconcealed note of trouble in her father's voice startled her, in her familiarity with every tone and every expression. She answered his question: "I don't know, Father."

"I want you to find out."

"In what way?"

"You must find a way. I shall tell Avery to help." He thought for several moments, while she stood waiting. "We must have that motor and the men in it traced, of course. Harriet, there are certain matters—correspondence—which Avery has been looking after for me; do you know what correspondence I mean?"

"Yes, Father."

"I would rather not have Avery bothered with it just now; I want him to give his whole attention to this present inquiry. You yourself will assume charge of the correspondence of which I speak, Daughter."

"Yes, Father. Do you want anything else now?"

"Not of you; send Avery to me."

CHAPTER XIV

Donald Avery Is Moody.

Harriet went down the stairs into the study; she passed through the study into the main part of the house and found Donald and sent him to her father; then she returned to the study. She closed and fastened the doors, and after glancing about the room, she removed the books in front of a wall-safe to the right of the door, slid back the movable panel, opened the safe and took out a bundle of correspondence. She closed safe and panel and put back the books; and carrying the correspondence to her father's desk, she began to look over it.

SUCCESS

It's doing your job the best you can.
And being just to your fellow man;
It's making money, but holding friends.
And staying true to your aims and ends;
It's figuring how and learning why
And looking forward and thinking high,
And dreaming a little and doing much;
It's keeping always in closest touch,
With what is finest in word and deed
It's being thorough yet making speed
It's daring blithely the field of chance
While making labor a brave romance;
It's going onward despite defeat
And fighting staunchly but keeping sweet;
It's being clean and it's playing fair;
It's laughing lightly at Dame Despair;
It's looking up at the stars above
And drinking deeply of life and love;
It's struggling on with a will to win,
It's taking loss with a cheerful grin;
It's sharing sorrow and work and mirth.
And making better this good old earth;
It's serving, striving through strain and stress.
It's doing your noblest—that's success. —Selected.

BELMOND WINS IN TOURNAMENT AT BRITT

Belmond Wins In Declamatory

Alfred Wilkinson Takes First Place In Oratorical Class At Kanawha.

GOES TO DISTRICT CONTEST

Last week was an important week in the history of Belmond high school. The declamatory contestants went to Kanawha for the preliminary contest in the state series. Alfred Wilkinson won first in the Oratorical class and will now go to the sub-district contest March 16.

The basket ball boys went to Britt to the tournament Friday noon. They played their first game with Livermore Friday evening winning with a score of 18 to 10. After Livermore had defeated Corwith, Belmond played Forest City in the semi-finals Saturday morning defeating them 31 to 11. Forest City had previously defeated Britt 14 to 12. It was supposed Britt was one of the strong teams in the tournament. Coach Pals put in his second team the last part of the game with Forest City.

The finals were played Saturday evening between Lake Mills and Belmond. Lake Mills had defeated Algona in the semi-finals in a closely fought contest by the score of 25 to 24.

Belmond and Lake Mills were evenly matched in the first half but Belmond was able to hold out longer than their opponents and so defeated Lake Mills 23 to 17.

The high school had a pep meeting Friday noon in honor of the basket ball boys and the declamatory contestants. Cecil Riley spoke of the work of the basket ball boys and the prospects for the team. Irving Madsen, the captain, answered for the team. Katherine Thiltgen spoke about the declamatory work and the response was given by Alfred Wilkinson. The high school songs and yells were given.

This week Friday and Saturday our boys attend the basket ball tournament at Fort Dodge. This tournament will decide the championship of Northwest Iowa. The winners of the Fort Dodge tournament go to the state tournament which is to be held at Boone.

Miss Rohrbach of the fifth grade is ill and out of school again this week. Mrs. Morse is substituting in that grade.

The storm Saturday compelled the Belmond people who were at Britt to leave their cars and return by way of Mason City Sunday.

The high school is indebted to C. C. McGuire for the loan of clothing for use in the operetta and to the Belmond Furniture Co. and the Wright County Furniture Co. for the loan of furniture.

The operetta Wednesday night was very well attended and the audience seemed very appreciative.

The members of the second grade had a frolic in the gymnasum Friday afternoon in honor of Stanley Ahlstrom who leaves this week for Sweden.

Mrs. Elder visited Friday of last week in Miss Murphy's room. Jessie Elder entered school after a long illness.

Mrs. John Greenlander and Miss Beatrice Barry visited Miss Newgard's room Friday.

Holm Swenson entered the third grade.

Frances Wilkins entered the seventh grade Monday.

Many of the children who have been sick are returning to school.

The following 6th graders wrote perfect in spelling the past six weeks: Frances Baker, Grant Chapman, Irene Dorr, Henry Johnson, Esther Jones, Helen Luick, Meta Ludtke, Paul Milligan, Lois Pech, Alberta Starnes, Esther Steenblock, Mildred Jacobson.

Miss Agnes Dillon, who is teaching second grade in the Corwith schools, spent the week end with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Pat Dillon. Miss Mildred Parsons accompanied her.

HANCOCK COUNTY WANTS RED CROSS NURSE AGAIN

Hancock county is endeavoring to secure again a county nurse. Miss Elizabeth Reynolds, Supt. of Red Cross nurses in Northern Iowa, has been in Garner on the question, and met with representatives of the town, Red Cross various societies and doctors, to discuss the project. The proposition as advanced by the Red Cross called for the school board to pay 50 cents per pupil per year, the Red Cross to look after the balance of the expense of maintaining a nurse. This would apply to various schools thruout the county, and the estimated expense is $3,500 a year. No definite action has been taken by the school boards on the subject as yet, and it is reported they may be somewhat lukewarm on it owing to the already heavy expense of the schools. A county nurse is a fine thing, and Hancock county will not regret it if one is secured.

BATES LOSES CASE IN DISTRICT COURT

After Appealing From Justice's Court Here Has To Take 30 Days Anyway.

Guy Bates was up before district court last Friday, on his appeal from Justice Skovlin's court last December when he was found guilty of being drunk and disorderly, had his trial was again found guilty, and sentenced to 30 days in the county jail Tuesday. He is now enjoying the approach of spring from his room in Hotel Lang, at Clarion.

The case occupied quite a bit of attention locally, and was attended by quite a few local people. Bates had subpeoned some 15 or 20 witness to swear that he was sober the day he was arrested, and in his testimony told all about where he was that day. After prosecuting Attorney Jensen started in on him however, it developed that he was in two place at once, and he immediately found himself in a predictament. "Eagle Eye" Barry, the well known sleuth, was the main convicting testimony, while Ben Blake added some convincing items, and after being out until 2 in the morning, hung by a couple of stubborn members, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and Tuesday the judge gave him the 30 days handed him last December by Justice Skovlin. Bates is now resting comfortably.

This case seems to have finished the booze gang, and the community is becoming what the great majority of citizens want it to be. Atty. Jensen is to be congratulated on the successful outcome.

ASK 25 CENTS FOR 24 HOUR SERVICE

The Goldfield Chronicle says that a move is on foot there to establish 24-hour telephone service in Goldfield, and that if this is done, a charge of 25 cents would be added to each phone. If the Goldfield folks are wise they will grab the chance before it can get away, and pay the two-bits cheerfully. Belmond has had continuous service for a good many years, and at no extra charge. This has been because the company was large enough to handle it without an extra charge. If folks here were out of telephone service all night they would holler their heads off, and we venture the Goldfield folks would too after they had had night service a month.

GOVERNMENT IS INVESTIGATING DEATH OF FISH

Last week the U. S. government had C. Blystad, a biologist of the U. S. fisheries, investigating the death of fish in the Iowa river. Mr. Blystad worked from Iowa Falls north to Belmond, and is making analysis of the fish found dead, and also the water of the river.

Mr. Blystad took the evidence of people living along the river. It is said that at Alden the fish were frozen in the ice in such quantities that much of the ice harvested for storage was rendered unfit for use, and caused considerable trouble to the ice men there. He reports that in his experience he has never yet seen conditions so serious as he found in the Iowa river between Belmond and Iowa Falls.

The state fish and game warden has finally concluded that shallow water in the Des Moines river and other Iowa streams has been responsible for the large number of fish that have died during the past few months. It was first thot that commercial industries had been using chemicals that poisoned the water, but this was a mistake. The fish, it seems collect in shallow water and when the ice freezes over them they soon suffocate, for want of air.—News.

"PEP" MEETING TO BE HELD AT AUDITORIUM

Big Time Tonight To Start The Belmond Team Toward The State Championship.

A Big Pep Meeting Will Be held at the school Auditorium tonight, Thursday, at 7:30, in which the team, students, fans and public generally will participate. Be there and help to arouse the spirit that will take Belmond thru to the championship of the state.

Plans are now on foot for a big bunch of Belmond basket ball bugs to go to Ft. Dodge on the Motor Friday night and return on the midnight train. The fare will be $1.42 one way and between 150 and 200 from here are expected to make the trip and cheer the boys on to victory. Will you be among them?

MRS. C. A. CHURCH DIES

Friends in Belmond received the sad news last week of the death of Mrs. C A. Church of Belmond, at San Diego, California, where she and Mr. Church were spending the winter months as had been their custom for some years past. Death was caused by heart trouble. When Mr. and Mrs. Church left for California in the fall, she was apparantly in good health, and as she had not been ill when at home the news of her sudden passing came as a great shock to the community. The Independent is not informed as to what disposal is to be made of the remains, whether interment is to be in California or here. One daughter the only child, preceeded her in death several years ago.

PAY UNDER PROTEST

An advertisement in the Garner papers last week signed by the "Taxpayers Committee" advises those who pay their taxes this spring on the paving to require the treasurer to endorse the receipt as "paid under protest. It is an echo of the protest over the paving tax which was made there last fall. The advertisement reads as follows:

On account of the fact that the litigation in court regarding the legality of paving tax has not been concluded, and may not be settled for some time yet, we are advised by our attorneys that taxpayers should in paying their taxes to the County Treasurer, require the Treasurer to endorse across the face of the tax receipt "Paid under protest." This will protect the taxpayers so that he can secure a refund of the disputed portion in case the suit is successful.

Signed: Taxpayers Committee.

CLARION GETTING READY TO START PAVING

The town of Clarion is about ready to start the wheels moving toward paving the town this summer. After many weeks of "watchful waiting" and planning, it is believed that the proposition is now about lined up and the city council is prepared to take action. The plans as finally adopted call for the paving of some 60 blocks thru the main part of town. A mile of the town on the east and west was turned back to the county last year, and it is expected that the county will gravel this. With the paving completed, and the other road graveled, Clarion will finaly be in shape so the motorist will not fear to venture their streets. It is a wise and progressive move on the part of the county seat.

MRS PETER STACY DIES

The community was surprised and shocked Wednesday morning, when it became known that Mrs. Peter Stacy had passed away that night Mrs. Stacy had been seriously ill for about a week with pneumonia, but had begun to gain and it was thought she would come thru the ordeal all right. Tuesday morning she took a turn for the worse, but nothing alarming, and that evening she was apparantly holding her own. Tuesday night, about a quarter after 12, while her daughter was taking her temperature, she suddenly ceased breathing and quietly passed away without knowing that the end was at hand.

Funeral services will be held Friday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock, the services being at the M. E church. They will be in charge of the church and the Order of Eastern Star, both of which the deceased was a member. Interment will be in Franklin Grove cemetery.

Sara Samantha Pratt was born December 18, 1856, at Wheatland, Illinois and died at her home in Belmond, Iowa on March 7, 1923, death being caused by pneumonia. In 1871 she was united in marriage to Peter Stacy, and to this union eight children were born, three of whom preceeded her in death, LeRoy, Vernie, and Fern. On February 9, 1875 she with her husband moved to Belmond, where the home had been ever since, thus making her one of the pioneer residents of this community. Mrs. Stacy had always been a home body, quiet and unassuming, and during her life here had made a host of friends whose sympathy goes out to the bereaved family in her passing. She is survived by her husband, and five children: Mrs. R. W. Beach of Wahpeton, North Dakota; Mrs. S. A. Wolcott of Fort Dodge, Iowa; Mrs. E. V. Skinner of Corry Pennsylvania; Mrs. J. Pratt of Algona, Iowa; and Lee W Stacy of Belmond, besides other relatives and her many friends.

OPERETTA PLEASES

The operetta "The Cherry Blossom," given at the high school auditorium last week Wednesday by the school children, was highly pleasing to those who attended, and many fine compliments were heard regarding it and the way the various characters took their parts. The operetta was attended by a crowded house, the receipts for the evening being about $185.00.

SMIDT-PALS

Miss Mattie Pals and Mr. John Smidt were united in marriage at the Parsonage of the Immanuel Reformed church, east of Belmond, on Thursday evening, March 1st., the Rev A. H. Waalkes performing the ceremony, which occured at 7:30 o'clock.

The groom is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Jake Smidt, of Pleasant township, and is a progressive, capable young man of that community.

The bride is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John D. Pals, of Palsville, and is one of Pleasant townships most charming young ladies

The parents of the groom have built a home in north Belmond where they will make their future home, and the happy young newlyweds will occupy the Smidt land which they will farm. The Independent joins in extending congratulations and best wishes.

"FOR WAYS THAT ARE DARK—"

The heathen chinee may be peculiar, as the poem goes, but certainly not more so than three bootleggers in Chicago recently. Three detectives saw a black hearse drawn up in front of a house in Chicago, and noticed, by chance, that a gunny sack was protruding from the door. They stopped to offer their "sympathy," and came away with several hundred quarts of "embalming fluid," which was valued at $10,000. The hearse was piled full to overflowing with booze in bottles packed with gunny sacks, the end of one sticking out giving the game away.

Now Go To Fort Dodge Semi-Finals

Clean Up On Livermore, Forest City and Lake Mills Without Very Much Trouble.

GO TO FT. DODGE FRIDAY

The tournament lasted three days, ten teams being entered: Britt, Corwith, Livermore, Algona, Lake Mills, Forest City, Belmond, Garner, LuVerne and Rowan.

Thursday, the first day, the Belmond team drew a bye. Then on, Friday night they played the Livermore team, winner of the Livermore and Corwith game. Livermore won from Corwith 17 to 12. Belmond did not get into their stride in this, their first, game, and only won from Livermore by a 17 to 10 score. The same evening Britt and Forest City played, Forest City winning 12 to 10. This was a hard fought battle. Britt leading at the end of the first half by 10 to 1. Forest City came back strong, however, and scored 11 points in the second half.

Saturday morning the Belmond and Forest City teams played, and this game was a comedy, Belmond walking all over them by a score of 32 to 11. The boys hit their stride here, and dazzled the Forest City team with their speed and team work. Scoring point upon point, at the end of the third quarter Coach Pals took his first team off the floor with the score 32 to 4 for Belmond, and put in the second string players. Against them Forest City was only able to score seven points, which shows that the second team was doing some mighty fine work too. One comical episode occured when the referee, a Drake man, saw Kenneth Nourse on the second team. He could hardly believe his eyes, and patting Kenneth on the head he said, "young man, what do you want?" Kenneth looked up at him solemnly, and replied, "Gimme a drink!"

Lake Mills and Algona fought it out Saturday morning, Lake Mills winning 26 to 25 in a bitterly contested game. This game was one of the best of the tournament and was fast and furious.

Saturday evening Belmond and Lake Mills battled for the final honors, and it was "some" game. Starting in furiously, Lake Mills scored two baskets right off the bat, and adding a foul to it had 5 to 0 when the quarter ended. In the second quarter Belmond hopped to it, and fighting like wildcats made the score 10 to 10 at the end of the half. From this on the game see-sawed back and forth, the score being even at 15 to 15 at the tightest point, when the Belmond boys turned loose all they had, and steadily pulled away from the Lake Mills team until the the game ended with Belmond on the long end of the 23 to 17 result.

Winning this game made 15 straight games that the Belmond team has won. If they do not win another this year, they have created an enviable record, and one of which every Belmond citizen is proud. Over 300 teams in the state have played to decide the state champion, and the list is now narrowed down to about 30. Four sectional meets will be held this week, and the four winners will play at Boone for the championship. Belmond goes to Fort Dodge Friday, to play. Should they win there, it will be "all aboard for Boone" with a big bunch of Belmond basket ball bugs. And Belmond is pulling for the boys to grab the honors again. While they will be up against the largest schools in the state, with hundreds of boys to choose a team from, the local team is no slouch and regardless of whom they meet, will give them a real battle.

The teams which will complete at the Fort Dodge tournament are Belmond, Spirit Lake, Fort Dodge, Alton, Laurens, Sioux City, Boone, and Vail. This is mighty fast company, and the games will call for everything the teams can show.

Two Belmond boys, Raymond Stapley and Irvin Madsen, were placed on the All-Tournament team at Britt by 13 disinterested judges.

TURN ON THE LIGHT

In some counties of the state, and in many towns and school districts, there is a disposition on the part of officials to evade the publicity that is required by the state laws regarding the expenditure of public moneys.

It is stated the school boards of the state spend $56,000,000 and more every year of money that is raised by taxation. The people of these districts have a right to know for what and where this money goes. They have a right to know the proceedings of school boards. Obviously, people cannot all attend school board meetings, nor can they take the time to personally examine the books of the officers who disburse the money. There is only one way in which people can have the informatinon they are entitled to this important matter of spending half the tax money of the state, and that is by reading it in their local newspapers, at their leisure, and thus have the facts filed away should they ever need them.

Likewise, some city and town councils are prone to go ahead transacting public business without letting the public know what they are doing unless the public happens to attend council sessions. The law contemplates that people may know of the councils' actions by reading a summary of the proceedings in their local newspapers, and have a statement of the money spent by vote of the council at each regular or special session. Why should the people not have such information? It is their money the officials are spending, and officials are servants of not masters of the people.

Boards of supervisors almost uniformly give complete publicity to their transaction and account for all bills allowed by printing the schedules of claims in the newspapers as provided by law. Why should they not? They are elected to serve the people and the people have a right to know.

Newspapers are the recognized and only available medium for complete publicity of affairs in any community. Readers look to them for all official and general news. The state laws have wisely provided that boards of supervisors, city and town councils and school boards shall publish in newspapers intelligent minutes of their meetings. For such boards to do less than the law requires is not to their credit, nor is it good service to their constituents

Posting of board and official proceedings or financial statements on a barn door or in stairways of public buildings is wasted energy and money both. It is at least suspicious when officials either try to evade newspaper publicity or hide their reports in long typewritten or handwritten sheets which many people cannot read, and all find inconvenient to study. The state laws provide for newspaper publicity and name a rate of pay for such space so low that there is no profit in the printing whatever, but there is a semi-news value in it that makes up partially for the lack of pay. Printing such reports without any pay would be too much of a burden to the publishers or they would perhaps do that in many places. But at the low rate allowed, taxpayers are able for a few cents each to get all the facts of public boards when they can read in comfort and digest well the evidence as printed in the newspapers.

Sometimes legislators with misguided notions of the importance of the matter try to curtail publicity of public affairs, rather than to promote more of such publicity They would be serving their constituents far better to help turn on the light, require full and fair acounting of money spent by public boards, and demand and enforce laws that will secure such publicity at regular intervals, and when people want it.

The newpapers of Iowa are standing by the interests of the people at every turn. They are the least paid and most used servants of the public—often maligned and belittled for their efforts in such service, it is true—but nevertheless true and dependable recorders of the present day history of every community. If our officials and our people realize that it is the record, the history of today, that each issue of the local newspaper presents, they will not premit of any curtailment of official publicity in any transaction where the public taxes are involved.

All officials are not dishonest or intending dishonesty where they fail to give publicity to their transactions. But that is not saying that many could not much easier and more safely become dishonest if all publicity of their acts could be kept in the dark room or vaults, to be made difficult of access.

In other words, it is much cheaper and better for the people to pay a little for real newspaper publicity that reaches everybody than to pay a lot for prosecution of defaulting officials and for the loss of public funds after somebody has gone wrong.

If you had your choice of spending 30 days on the inside looking out—sick, say, f'instance—in December, when the snow was thick and the weather cold, or in the spring when the grass is growin' and the birds asingin' and the air feels like a million dollars, which would you prefer?

Clarion is finally going to pave. After this the motorist can go to the county seat and not stop to think it over beforehand.

SAYS GOOD HEALTH IS DUE TO PROHIBITION

Iowa's good health is due to Iowa' strict entorcement of the prohibition laws, claims Supt. R. N. Holsaple of the Iowa Anti-Saloon League.

Deaths from alcoholism in this state have decreased 53 per cent under prohibition's regime, according to statistics obtained by Supt. Holsaple from Dr. Raney P. Fagen, head of the state board of health.

Cirrhosis of liver deaths, due principally to excessive use of alcohol, have decreased over 12 per cent.

These figures are obtained from comparison of the years 1913, 1914 and 1915, before prohibition was in effect, with 1920, 1921 and 1922, three years of prohibition enforcement.

Tuberculosis in Iowa has decreased 45 per cent in the past ten years, according to a statement of T. J. Edmonds secretary of the Iowa Tuberculosis association, to Anti-Saloon League representatives. Much of this decrease has taken place since the enactment of prohibition and much more is due to education along the lines of the evil effects of drink.

"Practically everyone is exposed to tuberculosis," Edmonds said. "Only those escape who are able to resist it. Drink lowers resistance and is therefore a primary factor in the fight for health."

QUALITY

When you get a piece of work done, what do you consider first before contracting for it? Quality, of course—will it be a good job? If it will you say "go ahead". The job is done. It's a good one, and you are willing to pay for it because you are satisfied with it. Consider then, your next piece of printing. You want it to be a good job; you want a satisfying piece of work. Very well, bring it to the Independent and you'll get it, because we guarantee you good, satisfying work or no pay. Ask anyone for whom we have printed. We do not slight a job, no matter how small, and we print anything but money. You can see samples of our work, and we charge by the Franklin Printing Price List, which does two things—guarantees a fair price to you, and the same to us. You can get cheaper work—but not better quality. We don't want "cheap" jobs, because the work won't help our printing reputation with whoever sees it, and you won't be satisfied yourself. And if you aren't satisfied you won't come again, which means no further business for us. But if you want good work—quality—then we are glad to do our very best to please you. We know that if we do a good job for you, that you will come again the next time, and whoever sees the work will know we do good printing. So we say to you if you consider quality an essential, call the Independent.

A land where the people constantly whoop about "personal liberty" is safer for human rights than one where they sneer at that phrase.

FARM NOTES BUREAU

Lively Social in Lake Township

The farmers of Lake township held a lively social and business meeting at the Center school house last Tuesday evening when they met for their regular monthly meeting of the Lake Township Farm Bureau.

The special feature of the program was a farce in one act entitled, "How to Keep 'Em on the Farm" which was put on by local talent. The play illustrated the point so many farmers are unable to see, the advantage which comes from cooperating with the county agent and the agricultural extension department. A very interesting reading entitled "Why We Should Make the Farm Bureau Go" was given by Mrs. John Power. A few recitations and a number of musical selections were given, as well as a short talk by the county agent.

The members of the Lake Township Farm Bureau are planning a rip-rousing good meeting for their next regular meeting night which comes on the fourth Tuesday of March, or March 27. We understand that the special features of this program will be the pie supper and all the pie-faced are urged to begin practicing up because there is to be a pie eating contest in connection with this entertainment. Come forth, ye pie-face, and get your hat in the ring.

Dairy Feeding And Management Schools

On Tuesday and Wednesday, March 13th and 14th, Prof. C. B. Finley, Professor of dairy production of the extension department at Ames, will be in Wright county to conduct two dairy feeding and management schools. The object of these schools will be to bring the farmers to a better knowledge of feeds and their value in connection with dairy cattle and to assist with their individual feeding and herd problems.

It has been planned to hold two all day meetings in different sections of the county, each school to be held in the afternoons commencing at one o'clock prompt. Prof. C. B Finley will be in charge of the lectures and demonstration work and will conduct the program according to the following schedule:

Wesdnesday, March 14—Belmond, City hall.

The program which will be conducted by Prof. Finley during each afternoon will be as follows:

"Feeding Requirements of Dairy Stock," "Examination of Refugees and Concentrates," "Requirements of Dairy Ration," "Balanced Rations," lecture and discussion on "Care and Management of the Dairy Herd."

Prof. Finley will also give a demonstration on judging of dairy cattle directly after dinner if desired.

With the increasing interest which has developed along the line of dairy production, these schools should be of great value to the farmers of Wright county. All farmers who own dairy cattle or who are producing dairy products in any form should make a special effort to hear Mr. Finley. He is an authority on dairy production work and will, no doubt, have a great message for the dairy farmers of Wright county.

Bids For Austin Market

President Barney Benson, Secretary M. L. Clark and Manager E. W. Campbell of the Clarion Livestock Shipping association and the county agent spent last Monday in Austin, Minn., in a conference with the officers of the Hormel Packing company in connection with the shipments of livestock through our local shipping association.

Arrangements have been made with the Hormel Co., for shipping the livestock, which comes through the Clarion Shipping association, to the packing plant at Austin. Heretofore the bulk of livestock shipments have been billed to the Chicago livestock commission firms which of course meant an added expense in shipping charges. With the new arrangements there will, no doubt, be increased returns realized by the farmers who ship through our local association.

The Clarion Livestock Shipping association has a total of 173 farmers signed on the producer's contract which provides that each member shall ship all surplus livestock through the local association. By shipping on the contract basis, each farmer realizes the full returns of what he brings on the market. The Clarion Shipping association has been a decided success and the membership seems to be increasing continually. The success of this association is due in a large measure to the untiring efforts of the local manager, E. W. Campbell.

Soy Beans a Profitable Crop

Considerable interest has developed, especially during the last year, in connection with the growing of soy beans as a leguminous crop on our Iowa farms. Heretofore, a great deal has been said about the growth of alfalfa and the clovers for the purpose of restoring nitrogen to the soil and for furnishing protein for our feeds, but soy beans seems to be coming into its own and a great many farmers of Wright county are planning to grow the soy bean this year.

The soy beans are comparatively easy to grow and according to experiments which have been conducted at our experimental station, they contain a higher percentage of protein for animal feeds than any other leguminous crop. They may be grown on any soil which will produce corn and on even poor soil they will yield well. In the feed experiments which have been conducted at the Iowa Experiment Station it has been shown that soy beans have a protein supplement for hogs worth $156 per bushel when tankage is worth $70 a ton. The station also found that ground soy beans are worth one-third more than oil meal and they say for milk production that soy beans are worth $60 a ton when oil meal is worth $40 a ton. The poultry department of the experiment station has found that soy beans make a very good supplement for poultry to take the place of meat scraps. It has also been found that when soy beans are mixed with corn the silage yield per acre is greater than with corn alone. Many of the Wright county farmers have found by actual experiment that it is profitable to plant soy beans with corn for hogging down. Many of our farmers are now planting the soy bean for hay and find that it is about equal, pound for pound, to alfalfa. It is palatable and relished by livestock. Soy beans have a decided advantage over some of the other leguminous crops in that they will grow fairly well on soils that are too acid to produce other leguminous crops, such as alfalfa and the clovers. Another advantage of the growing of soy beans for hay is that the time for making hay comes in late August or early September when the farmer is not busy with other farm work.

The county agent has a new list of the sources of the soy bean and also a new bulletin on the growth of the soy beans and those who are interested should either call on or write for further information on this subject.

Cow Testing Association Elects Officers and Directors

The Wright County Cow Testing association which was organized a short time ago held its first regular meeting at the Belmond township hall last Saturday afternoon. March 3rd, at which the officers and directors of the organization were to be elected but there were not enough members present to hold the election and therefor this matter had to be postponed until the next meeting.

The constitution and by-laws of the organization were read and adopted at this meeting and the membership contract between the association and the individual members was signed by those who attended the meeting.

Prof C. B. Finley of the dairy department of the extension service expects to start the cow tester in Wright county about the middle of March. Those who have joined the association are very anxious that the tester begin work so that they can commence to check up on their milk records of the cows of various herds. A great many of our dairy farmers are deeply interested in knowing more about the balanced ration for dairy cows and according to Mr Finley, the tester will be able to give assistance along this line.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

Lenten dishes—During this season when so many families refrain from using meat, the housewife likes to serve a variety of fish and meat substitute dishes. These recipes may be of use:

Codfish with rice and tomatoes—Soak 1 cup codfish over night; drain brown in fat, add 1 cup cooked rice. 1 small onion, chopped fine, and 1 cup cooked tomatoes. Add seasonings and cook.

Cheese Fondu—1 cup bread crumbs 1½ cup milk, 1 cup grated cheese, 2 eggs, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon baking powder. Beat yolks until thick; add salt, crumbs, baking powder, then put in cheese and egg whites. Place in buttered pan, set in another pan containing water and bake in moderate owen.

Egg and Potato dish—In a baking pan arrange alternate layers of cold potatoes and hard cooked eggs cut in quarter inch slices; sprinkle with salt and pepper; nearly cover with white sauce. Sprinkle grated cheese over each layer; cover with toasted crumbs and bake until thoroughly heated.

Pea or bean Souffle—1 cup of pea or bean pulp, 1-3 cup bread crumbs, salt and peper to taste, 3 eggs, ½ cup milk; make the white sauce, add crumbs, pulp, beaten yolks, then the egg whites and bake until firm in moderate oven.

Cottage Cheese and Nut Roast—1 cup cottage cheese, 1 cup chopped nutmeats, 1 cup bread crumbs, 2 chopped onion, 1 tablespoonful fat, juice of ½ lemon, salt and peper. Cook onion in the fat and a little water until tender; mix other ingredients, moisten with the water in which onion was cooked. Pour in shallow baking dish and brown in the oven.

Salt as a cleanser—A solution of salt and vinegar is an excellent cleanser for water jugs, vases, pitchers. Use a desert spoonful of rough salt moistened with vinegar; put in a bottle and shake well. Then wash in warm soapsuds, rinse in warm, clear water.

Gum is removed from clothing or furniture by rubbing it gently with gasoline. The gum crumbles and then can be brushed off.

Where The Milk Went

This happened at the Chicago live stock show. A doctor stood admiring a large fat hog when a small boy standing by piped up. "That's my father's hog. The hog that won first prize."

"Wonderful," said the doctor. "Certainly a very fine hog." Then he looked at the boy. "How old are you son?" he asked.

"I'm twelve past," said the boy.

"Why," said the doctor, "you are small for a nine-year-old. What do you eat and drink?"

"Just what the rest of the folks do—bread, meat ,pie, potatoes, cake and tea."

"But" queried the doctor, "don't you drink milk?"

"Naw," said the boy in a tone of disgust, "we feed milk to the hogs."

KLEMME VOTES FOR BETTER SCHOOLS

Times.—Klemme had an election here on Monday, February 26th, to decide the question whether the district should improve the school situation by building an addition to the old building, or to build a new fire-proof school building, or to do without either one or the other. This matter had been the main topic of conversation and many heated arguments for the past couple of weeks. The election is over but the arguments do not seem to be entirely settled with some. At any rate the taxpayers came to the rescue of the Klemme schools and voted in improvements Monday—in fact they out-did themselves in their generosity and gave Klemme two propositions for improvement.

Now we will look into the votes as they were cast. The proposition for $15,000 for an addition to the old building carried by a vote of 150 for, and 83 against, with about 7 or 8 spoiled ballots also cast. Now, there is no question but what the addition project carried. For the new building the vote stood 116 for and 113 against, carrying by three votes. There were about 13 ballots spoiled on this issue. Here is just where the argument comes in. Some claim that the proposition did carry. Others claim that it did not carry as it did not get a majority of the total ballots cast. They contend that spoiled ballots count in determing the total number of votes cast, and if this is the case, then the project lost. We have our doubts as to this, but not being an attorney of the law we are unable to give an answer to the question now puzzling the voters.

The addition received by far the greatest support of the two propositions and seems to be the choice of a large number of taxpayers. The election was a mixed up affair all the way though. Many people voted "yes" on both questions in order to be sure of getting something. Now the gang in favor of the new building claim they helped the addition, this is of course true; on the other hand many of the addition backers also helped the new project. They did this to off-set a lot of expected downers against both, but the downers did not appear in such strong force as had been expected, so really the voters raised Ned with each other and if they had voted their own project the two propositions would have come out somewhere near close.

Anyway we are glad that Klemme schools are to be improved and the coveted twelve grades installed for next year.

The vote on the new building is as follows: Men—for 68, against 70: Women—for 48, against 34. Total—for 116, against 113; with about 13 spoiled ballots.

The vote on the $15,000 addition was as follows: Men—for 93 against 55; Women—for 57, against 28; Total—for 150, against 83. About 7 spoiled ballots.

Now, what next?

MESERVEY SCHOOL NOTES

High School Notes

The movie given last Friday night by the high school consisted of a Western picture "The Luck of Roaring Cap," scenes from the Holy Land, scenes from Culver Military Academy, and two reels showing the stages in the growth and manufacture of cotton. This is the last movie that is to be given by the high school and we desire to give a word of explanation as to our reason for discontinuing them. It was impossible to enjoy the last two movies because of persons throwing "stink bombs." It was only due to the fact that these persons were attending school that they were not turned over to the local authorities. No admission has been charged to these movies in order that all might feel free to attend. It is a fact greatly to be deplored by the community that we have in our midst people with such a perverted sense of humor that they cannot enjoy themselves without becoming not only a thorn in the flesh but a public nuisance to those about them.

Take due notice and govern yourselves accordingly. Patience has ceased to be a virtue and if at any future entertainments another episode of this nature should arise the offenders will be dealt with according to their deserts.

Grammar Room

Those having 100 in spelling for the week are Grace Boleman and Tena Pals.

WHAT WOULD YOU KNOW ABOUT YOUR FLAG? READ THIS

What do you want to know about the flag?

If anything, read below what Miss Helen Needles, historian of Argonne Post, prepared and which has been sent to every school in Polk county:

Approved by the Americanization committee Argonne Post No. 60 American Legion.

From 1795 to 1818 the flag had fifteen stars and stripes.

Since 1818, the flag has had a star for each state, now forty-eight stars and a stripe for each of the original thirteen colonies.

Iowa was admitted to the union in 1846.

The red stripes remind Americans of the red blood sacrified to build and protect the United States; the white stripes stand for American ideals of purity, national and personal; the blue field sparkling with a star for each one of the forty-eight commonweaths is the emblem of "true-blue" loyalty to the union and to the "Power that hath made and preserved us a nation."

The flag pledge:

"I pledge allegiance to my flag an" to the Republic for which it stands: one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

The children's pledge to the flag:

"I give my heart, my head and my hand to God and my country, one country, one language, one flag."

Own your own flag—especially for these flag days:

February 12 (1809) Lincoln's birthday.

February 22 (1732) Washington's birthday.

May, second Sunday Mother's day.

May 30 (since 1868) Memorial day.

June 14 (1777 Flag day.

July 4 (1776) Independence day.

November 11 (1918) Armistice day.

The national anthem of the United States of America is "The Star Spangled Banner."

"The Star Spangled Banner" must never be played in a medley or as an exit march.

Rules for Honors to the Flag

(A) when the flag passes by on the street and is a large flag, carried elevated on a staff as in a parade or funeral procession, if you are sitting, stand still and erect facing the flag. The man or boy in civilian clothes takes off his hat or cap with his right hand and places it against his left shoulder, standing at attention, silent. Men in uniform give right hand salute.

(B) When the flag is being hoisted or lowered, rule A also governs.

(C) When the flag is thrown on the screen at a motion picture theatre, no formal honor is required but applause is nearly always fitting and proper.

(D) Face the flag or music whenever "The Star Spangled Banner" is played or sung within hearing, and stand, head uncovered and at attention.

Note—If nobody but yourself in a street crowd removes his hat for the passing flag, and nobdy but yourself in a theater audience stands at attention for "The Star Spangled Banner," don't be a slacker and quitter. Knowledge and courage will establish the habit of flag honor in America.

1. Do not hoist the flag before sunrise nor let it remain flying after sunset.

2. Do not let the flag touch the ground when being hoisted or lowered. It should float freely at all times and if caught should be released at once.

3. Do not drape the fag; always arrange to hang in straight lines.

4. Do not use the flag as a cover for a desk, table or box. Never place anything on the flag.

5. Do not use the flag when clusters of drapings or colors are desired; use bunting or cloth.

6. Do not use the flag in whole or in part as a custome and when worn as a badge it should be small and pinned over the left breast or to the left lapel. It must never be used for advertising purposes—not even the picture of it.

7. Do not wash the flag; when soiled or old it should be decently burned.

8. Do not use the flag for decorating automobiles or bicycles, except on staff where it can fly free. Buntgin should be used for decorating.

Rules for Displaying and Using Flag

1. To hang the flag on wall horizontally (the long way of stripes) keep starry field at your upper left (as you face the flag).

2. To hang the flag on a wall vertically (the stripes running up and down), keep starry field at your upper right (as you face the flag.)

3. To hang the flag as a streamer, to be viewed from both sides, as when stretched across a street or suspended from a roof or ceiling, keep the starry field always toward the east or the north.

4. The flag must never be draped or festooned but always arranged to hang in straight lines. The flag must not be placed lower than the seats on a platform or below a person seated. It must not be used as a cover for a desk table or box.

Nothing must ever be placed on the flag unless it be the Bible. When the flag is an altar covering the starry field should be placed at the right as you face the altar.

When clusters or drapings of color are desired, bunting or cloth should be used; never use the flag.

5. When the American flag is carried with others in parade, it must have the place of honor at the right of the other flags and is never dipped. But if many other flag are carried our flag must either precede the others or be carried in the center and above the others, on a higher staff.

6. In raising other flags with ours the American flag must be above the others never below. But the church penant, which is a blue cros on a white triangle, flies above the flag during religious services in a military chapel or aboard a ship of the navy.

7. In placing the flag at half-staff always hoist to the top of the staff and then lower to position (the top of the flag one-third down from top of pole.) In lowering from half staff the flag should also first be raised to top of staff. On Memorial day the flag should be at half-mast until noon and at full staff the remainder of the day.

8. Do not hoist the fag before sunrise nor allow it to remain hoisted after sunset, except that from private flagpoles the flag may fly at all hours day or night.

9. Never allow the flag to touch the ground or floor when being hoisted or lowered. It should all times float freely and if caught be relearsed at once. Never allow the flag to lie on the floor or walk, or in the street.

10. The flag must not be worn in whole or in part as a costume, and when worn as a badge it should be small and pinned over the left breast or to the lapel. It must never be used for advertising purpose—not even a picture of it.

11. It is unlawful to trample unon mutilate or otherwise treat the flag with insult or contempt or attach to it any emblem or inscrintion whatever. Do not drive tacks in the flag.

LEGISLATORS RECONVENED MARCH 6

(By G. L. Caswell)

Des Moines, March 8 1923.

A summary of the accomplishments of the Fortieth General Assembly up to the time of the March recess reveals even less of constructive work done than general reports indicated.. In fact, almost everything of large interest or new thought along legislative lines has been side-stepped, probably with an idea that such things can be better taken up later in the session. The result is almost a congestion of legislation to be acted upon now, in the next five or six weeks, if the session is to run no longer than the usual time—100 days.

One outstanding new departure in state government proposed is that of the permanent taxation commission worked on taxation matters, studying them in detail and visiting many other states in quest of information. The result is a long and important report of the comission, with recommendations for a complete change in the system of making assessments. Instead of each township and district corporation having an assessor, the commission plan would provide one county assessor in each county, this assessor to work the year through, on salary, and superintend the assessment of all property in the county. An assessment board in each county would be supplemented by a state assessment board or board of review, which would equalize valuations and other matters. There are petitions and protest galore against this sort of thing. Too many local assessors would be dispensed with, and then, in many localities, members of the commission say, there are assessors who are too easy and lienient with property owners in the matter of fixing valuations, and in these localities the taxpayers do not want the present system disturbed. Again, a county assessor might not be so interested in his neighbors and would dig up all the property that should be assessed. It is claimed that at present a great deal of personal property is overlooked in the assessment made. Some members of the legislature even go farther and say that if all the property that is assessable were listed as it should be, there would be a material reduction in the millage levies now made. In the end, it is the valuation of property that fixes the levies necessary. If all property is fully assessed the levy can be less; if there is much property under assessment, the millage levies must be higher. If a certain amount of public money has to be raised, the millage levy on the property as assessed is the only way to get it, excepting through special taxes.

And in special taxes, there is a disposition in this general Assembly that may be regarded by some interests as mighty dangerous. Not so much kick is heard about a possible tax on gasoline for road purpose as is heard about the proposed income tax, provide for in a bill in the House. This bill would impose a tax of one per cent per thousand dollars of income, two per cent on each two thousand dollars income, three per cent on three thousand dollars, and on up. It would also bump in corporations of the state, and in turn would hit the industries of Iowa hard. People regard corporations as the big and ugly things that run railroads, operate oil companies and steel trusts, when in fact the greater part of them are corporations in every town and city, of moderate capital and limited capacity for either making money or paying high penalty for existing. These will be hit and hit hard if the proposed special taxation bills should pass.

The taxation commission favors a gasoline tax of one cent per gallon to raise three million dollars to do away with the two-mill road tax all over the state. Other bills introduced would require a like tax for other purposes, while one bill provides for a two-cent per gallon tax and would apply the funds directly to paved trunk line roads across the state to make a net-work of hard-surfaced roads as a basis for a better roads system. Still another bill provides for cutting down the automobile license fees considerably, and this bill is favored if a gasoline tax measure is passed.

Appropriations of Millions

In their order will come up now the other large matters of the session—appropriations especially. Some thing over $31,000,000 is provided for in appropriation bills now pending. There will be an increase, it is stated, of more than $8,000,000 over the askings of two years ago. And the legislator elected on a pledge of economy and retrenchment in state and public expenses is going to have to think and study hard to find a way to get around such enomous appropriations without injuring the state at large and doing an iniustice to many interests that are building up the commonwealth. That the askings will be spared down, there can be no doubt. But it will be interesting to see where and how they can be curtailed by the statesmen now on the membership of the two houses with due regard to their campaign pledges and to the best interests of the state. It is no easy matter, and no pleasant choice to make.

In election matters but one little bill has been acted upon by both houses, and that eliminates the use of women in school elections. Twenty-five other bills dealing with elections to doing away with the primaries altogether. Thirty bills on schools and school matters are pending while courts and court procedure have attracted twenty-five more. Cities and towns and also counties and townships are affected by twenty-five other bills that are introduced, and more to come. In addition there are two score of bills in the code revision section affecting cities and towns alone.

Highway Committees Important

Roads and highways are again the center of a revolving hurricane. Thirty or forty bills pending are directed at correcting, changing, adding to or eliminating from highways and roads some of the present laws and regulations. Just where it will all end ,no man can foresee but there is hope of sane and sensible action when the radical elements are brought together in consideration of bills and propositions to be advanced by the special sub-committees of the two highways committees recently appointed. Unless these sub-committees can bring order out of the chaos that now appears in highway matters, little change or accomplishment may be expected. But the general opinion is that sensible thought and action will finally prevail as members get down to brass tacks and calm thought on the subject.

The idea that certain state departments could be consolidated or eliminated, as advanced by Governor Kendall, sounded all right when it was first spoken. But members who have given the subject much attention state that there is likely to be very little done along that line, for the very good reason that when they get to specifying which and what department shall be changed or consolidated there is a terrible protest and a showing that it cannot be done. A departmental affairs committee named by Lieut-Governor Hammill is said to have little headway toward consolidation of co-ordination of departmental, but it still has some hopes. But not even the governor can specify, they say, very many departments that can be changed from the present establishment it is easy to generalize and talk about reforms of this kind, but when it comes to action of a definite nature, something more than speech is necessary. So far the board of parole is about the only one set out for slaughter, and it is not in the best of repute among legislators.

What the Bills Concern

Another twenty-five bills introduced concern courts and the judiciary, some of them providing for additional judges in certain districts—one at Sioux City and one at Mason City having been granted. Sixteen or more new laws are proposed relating to railroads, eight to public health, half a dozen to intoxicating liquors and supression of intemperance, a dozen to state educational institutions, some to fish and game laws, and insurance, and various matters.

Thus the statement made at the beginning of this summary, that most of the big legislation proposed for this session of the Fortieth General Assembly remains to be done during the last half of the session, and it will be some diligent and much-tired legislators who return to their homes about the middle of April if they handle even a repectable part of the work outlined for them now. That they are earnest, honest and sincere men generally, goes without saying. They have only the conflicting ideas that may be expected in such a number of men representing diverse interests. Probably not a dozen of the whole number will be satisfied or pleased with what has been done when they get through, but they will feel they have done their best, whether their people appreciate it or not.

Two New Propositions

A bill to curb combinations of interests or industries to fix prices or form trusts will come out of the attorney general's office early when the legislature reconvenes this week. It will provide for a board of inquiry composed of the state railway commission and the deans of the engineering departments of the state university and state agricultural college. There has been shown a need for some such law in the matter of coal and cement industries and other lines, so it is stated. One provision is that a like price, without apparent competition, for certain products all over the state will be presumphive evidence that concerns involved are in a combination to fix prices.

Governor Kendall is said to be favoring some action that will permit the state to control and have a choice in the development of water power sites on the rivers of the state. Privileges granted to companies or corporations for valuable water power will be limited and possibly be made revenue producing in the way of an occupational tax assessed for the benefit of the state. Rivers and lakes of a certain size are by law state waters and can be used or controlled only by the consent of the state. Many companies have already secured valuable privileges on state rivers and they cannot be now interfered with, according to the governor, but new concerns can be regulated in this respect without injury to anybody.

Rural Credits Considered

With the favorable action of the U S. congress recently on the rural credits about what this legislature will do with the same matter. A rural credits bill or resolution which would amend the state constitution so that the credit of the state can be used to guarantee bond issues for the purpose of raising money to loan on real estate, has passed one house, and may pass the other. As the same resolution must pass another General Assembly and then be voted on by the people the present legislature does not feel so immediately involved in the consequences if they vote for it. The proposition is strongy favored by farmers' organizations, which gives it more than the usual strength.

Convening this week Tuesday, the General Assembly will continue in session almost uninterruptedly till about the middle of April. The question of a special session to come later in the year is up to the governor alone. Some say that Governor Kendall is not pleased with the attitude of the present General Assembly toward Code revision and that he will not call a special session on the showing so far made. There may be some politics behind the whole proposition, the writer cannot say. But there is no chance taken in saying that this regular session cannot now begin to handle the Code revision matter with any idea of finishing it this year.

SHEFFIELD BANK OFFICERS ARE IN TROUBLE

Chronicle—C. J. LeValley, cashier and C. C. Storck, assistant cashier of the recently defunct Farmers and Merchants bank at Sheffield, were arrested last Tuesday night, charged with fraudulent banking. Sheriff A. B. Atkinson took them before Judge D. W. Parks, who put both men under bonds pending their preliminary hearing which has been set for next Tuesday, March 6th, at 2:00 o'clock. Storck's bond is $2,500, and LeValley is held under $1,500.

The men who filed the complaint with County Attorney R. R. Stuart against the two bankers are Ole Koenigsberg and Roy Koenigsberg, two young farmers residing in the vicinity of Sheffield. The charge against Storck is obtaining a signature to a written promissory note by false pretenses, and the charge against LeValley is embezzlement by bailee.

It is said that many patrons of the bank were "required" to give duplicate notes to the bank when wanting a loan, officers of the bank claiming that this was necessary as security in getting the money on the notes from outside banks. Now many of those who have notes at the Farmers and Merchants Bank have been receiving notices from other concerns demanding payment of these aforesaid notes, and patrons of the bank began to see how the fraud has been worked against them. For instance a patron of the bank may actually have owed the bank $1,000, but now finds that with duplicate notes which they gave to the bank on request that they are holding the sack for several times the amount of the notes which they are actually owing the bank.

The failure of the bank is regretable in many ways. Its failure will cause ruin to many people, as it is not believed that the assets of the bank will be sufficient to even pay the court expenses of the litigation. Then there is enough evidence on the surface to indicate that the management of the bank will have a hard time explaining the many criminal charges which are likely to be brought against them.

County Attorney Stuart will appear for the state in the criminal prosecution against the bankers, and Mallory & Leming will appear for the defendants.

The arrest of C. J. LeValley, charged with embezzlement has created widespread interest over the county, and in other parts of the state where he is known. He is a former member of the legislature from Franklin county, and four years ago was floorman in the house of representatives for Governor W. L. Harding when the governor was fighting impeachment charges because of his connection with the famous Rathbun pardon case. LeValley took a poll of the house and was the first to announce that the governor had sufficient votes to defeat the impeachment charges.

REMEMBER THESE POINTS DURING INCUBATION PERIOD

Have the incubator in a well ventilated cellar with sufficient moisture and with the cellar windows open freely.

Keep the eggs for not more than ten days prior to incubating in a room with a temperature of 50 to 60 degrees F. without turning.

Use the best grade of kerosene in the machine with a new wick, properly rounded for every hatch.

If the machine is designed for moisture pens, keep about one-half inch of sand soaked with water at all times.

After eggs are put in the incubator, turn them three times a day until the first egg has pipped.

Keep the temperature of a hanging thermometer, placed half an inch above the eggs, at 103 degrees throughout the hatch.

After the hatch is half over, open the ventilator. After it is over keep the chicks in the incubator for 48 hours to dry off; but have front door open at top about an inch. keep curtain over glass in door, and use burlap in place o tray.

After the chicks have been removed to the brooder house, wash thoroughly all parts of the machine with a solution of two tablespoons of a good coal-tar disinfectant in a pail of warm water.

A Different Matter.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hilliward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

CHAPTER VII.—Circumstances point to Eaton as Santoine's assailant.

CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on Warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Harriet Santoine to withhold judgment, telling her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers sufficiently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier requires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the position of a semi-prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.—Eaton meets a resident of the house, Wallace Blatchford, and a young girl, Mildred Davis, with whom apparently he is acquainted, though they conceal the fact. Eaton's mission is to secure certain documents which are vital to his interests, and his being admitted to the house is a remarkable stroke of luck. The girl agrees to aid him. He becomes deeply interested in Harriet Santoine, and she in him.

CHAPTER XII.—Harriet tells Eaton she and Donald Avery act as "eyes" to Santoine, reading to him the documents on which he bases his judgments. While walking with her, two men in an automobile deliberately attempt to run Eaton down. He escapes with slight injuries. The girl recognizes one of the men as having been on the train on which they came from Seattle.

CHAPTER XIII.—Santoine questions Eaton closely, but the latter is reticent. The blind man tells him he is convinced the attack made on him on the train was the result of an error, the attacker having planned to kill Eaton. Santoine tells Harriet she is to take charge of certain papers connected with the "Latron properties," which had hitherto been in Avery's charge.

CHAPTER XIV.—Avery seeks to influence Harriet, as his wife to be, to give the papers to him. She refuses. Harriet is beginning to feel that her love belongs to Eaton.

This correspondence—a considerable bundle of letters held together with wire clips and the two envelopes bound with tape which she had put into the safe the day before—made up the papers of which her father had spoken to her. These letters represented the contentions of willful, powerful and sometimes ruthless and violent men. Ruin of one man by another—ruin financial, social or moral, or all three together—was the intention of the principals concerned in this correspondence; too often, she knew, one man or one group had carried out a fierce intent upon another; and sometimes, she was aware, these bitter feuds had carried certain of her father's clients further even than personal or family ruin; fraud, violence and—twice now—even murder were represented by this correspondence; for the papers relating to the Warden and the Latron murders were here. She had felt always the horror of this violent and ruthless side of the men with whom her father dealt; but now she knew that actual appreciation of the crimes that passed as business had been far from her. And, strangely, she now realized that it was not the attacks on Mr. Warden and her father—overwhelming with horror as these had been—which were bringing that appreciation home to her. It was her understanding now that the attack was not meant for her father but for Eaton.

Harriet had never believed that Eaton had been concerned in the attack upon her father, her denial of it had been checked and stifled because he would not even defend himself. She had not known what to think; she had seemed to herself to be waiting with her thoughts in abeyance; until he should be cleared, she had tried not to let herself think more about Eaton than was necessary. Though he was involved with her father in some way, she refused to believe he was against her father, but clearly he was not with him. How could he be involved, then, unless the injury he had suffered was some such act of man against man as these letters and statements represented? She looked carefully through all the contents of the envelopes, but she could not find anything which helped her.

She pushed the letters away, then, and sat thinking. Mr. Warden, who appeared to have known more about Eaton than anyone else, had taken Eaton's side; it was because he had been going to help Eaton that Mr. Warden had been killed. Would not her father be ready to help Eaton, then, if he knew as much about him as Mr. Warden had known? But Mr. Warden, apparently, had kept what he knew even from his own wife; and Eaton was now keeping it from everyone—her father included. She felt that her father had understood and appreciated all this long before herself—that it was the reason for his attitude toward Eaton on the train and, in part, the cause of his considerate treatment of him all through.

So, instead of being estranged by Eaton's manner to her father, she felt an impulse of feeling toward him flooding her, a feeling which she tried to explain to herself as sympathy. But it was not just sympathy; she would not say even to herself what it was.

She got up suddenly and went to the door and looked into the hall; a servant came to her.

"Is Mr. Avery still with Mr. Santoine?" she asked.

"No, Miss Santoine; he has gone out."

"Thank you."

She went back, and bundling the correspondence together as it had been before, she removed the books from a shelf to the left of the door, slid back another panel and revealed a second wall-safe corresponding to the one to the right of the door from which she had taken the papers. The combination of this second safe was known only to her father and herself. She put the envelopes into it, closed it, and replaced the books. Then she went to her father's desk, took from a drawer a long typewritten report of which he had asked her to prepare a digest, and read it through; consciously concentrating, she began her work. At three she heard Avery's motor, and went to the study door and looked out as he entered the hall.

"What have you found, Don?" she inquired.

"Nothing yet, Harry."

"You got no trace of them?"

"No; too many motors pass on that road for the car to be recalled particularly. I've started what inquiries are possible and arranged to have the road watched in case they come back this way."

He went past her and up to her father. She returned to the study and put away her work.

Dinner was served in the great Jacobean dining room, with walls paneled to the high ceiling, logs blazing in the big stone fireplace. As they seated themselves, she noted that Avery seemed moody and uncommunicative; something, clearly, had irritated and disturbed him; and as the meal progressed, he vented his irritation upon Eaton by affronting him more openly by word and look than he had ever done before in her presence. She was the more surprised at his doing this now, because she knew that Donald must have received from her father the same instructions as had been given herself to learn whatever was possible of Eaton's former position in life.

Before Eaton's entrance into her life she had supposed that some time, as a matter of course, she was going to marry Donald. In spite of this, she had never thought of herself as apart from her father; when she thought of marrying, it had been always with the idea that her duty to her husband must be secondary to that to her father; she knew now that she had accepted Donald Avery not because he had become necessary to her but because he had seemed essential to her father and her marrying Donald would permit her life to go on much as it was.

Donald had social position and a certain amount of wealth and power; now suddenly she was feeling that he had nothing but these things, that his own unconscious admission was that to be worth while he must have them, that to retain and increase them was his only object in life. She had the feeling that these were the only things he would fight for; but that for these he would fight—fairly, perhaps, if he could—but, if he must, unfairly, despicably.

She had finished dinner, but she hesitated to rise and leave the men alone; after-dinner cigars and the fiction of the masculine conversation about the table were insisted on by Blatchford. As she delayed, looking across the table at Eaton, his eyes met hers; reassured, she rose at once; the three rose with her and stood while she went out. She went upstairs and looked in upon her father; he wanted nothing, and after a conversation with him as short as she could make it, she came down again. No further disagreement between the two men, apparently, had happened after she left the table. Avery now was not visible. Eaton and Blatchford were in the music-room. With a repugnance against her father's orders which she had never felt before, she began to carry out the instructions her father had given her.

She noticed that Eaton was familiar with almost everything she had liked which had been written or was current up to five years before; all later music was strange to him. To this extent he had been of her world, plainly, up to five years before; then he had gone out of it.

She realized this only as something which she was to report to her father; yet she felt a keener, more personal interest in it than that. Harriet Santoine knew enough of the world to know that few men break completely all social connections without some link of either fact or memory still holding them, and that this link most often is a woman.

Toward ten o'clock Eaton excused himself and went to his rooms. She sat for a time, idly talking with Blatchford; then, as a servant passed through the hall and she mistook momentarily his footsteps for those of Avery, she got up suddenly and went upstairs. It was only after reaching her rooms that she appreciated that the meaning of this action was that she shrank from seeing Avery again that night. But she had been in her rooms only a few minutes when her house telephone buzzed, and answering it, she found that it was Donald speaking to her.

"Will You Come Down for a Few Minutes, Please, Harry?"

"Will you come down for a few minutes, please, Harry?"

Some strangeness in his tone perplexed her.

"Where are you?" she asked.

"In the study."

She went down at once. As he came to the study door to meet her, she saw that what had perplexed her in his tone was apparently only the remnant of that irritation he had showed at dinner. He took her hand and drew her into the study.

"You don't mind my calling you down, Harry; it is so long since we had even a few minutes alone together," he pleaded.

"What is it you want, Don?" she asked.

"Only to see you, dear—Harry." He took her hand again; she resisted and withdrew it. "I can't do any more work tonight, Harry. I find the correspondence I expected to go over this evening isn't here; your father has it, I suppose."

"No; I have it, Don."

"You?"

"Yes; Father didn't want you bothered by that work just now. Didn't he tell you?"

"He told me that, of course, Harry, and that he had asked you to relieve me as much as you could; he didn't say he had told you to take charge of the papers. Did he do that?"

"I thought that was implied. If you need them, I'll get them for you, Don. Do you want them?"

She got up and went toward the safe where she had put them; suddenly she stopped. What it was that she had felt under his tone and manner, she could not tell; it was probably only irritation at having important work taken out of his hands. But whatever it was, he was not openly expressing it—he was even being careful that it should not be expressed. And now suddenly, as he followed and came close behind her and her mind went swiftly to her father lying helpless upstairs, and her father's trust in her, she halted.

"We must ask Father," she said.

"Ask him!" he ejaculated, "Why?"

She faced him uncertainly, not answering.

"That's rather ridiculous, Harry, especially as it is too late to ask him tonight." His voice was suddenly rough in his irritation. "I have had charge of those very things for years; they concern the matters in which your father particularly confides in me. It is impossible that he meant you to take them out of my hands like this. He must have meant only that you were to give me what help you could with them! Harry, don't you see that you are putting me in a false position—wronging me? You are acting as though you did not trust me!"

"I do trust you, Don; at least I have no reason to distrust you. I only say we must ask Father."

"They're in your little safe?"

She nodded. "Yes."

"And you'll not give them to me?"

"No."

He stared angrily; then he shrugged and laughed and went back to his desk and began gathering up his scattered papers. She stood indecisively watching him. Suddenly he looked up, and she saw that he had quite conquered his irritation, or at least had concealed it; his concern now seemed to be only over his relations with herself.

"We've not quarreled, Harry?" he asked.

"Quarreled? Not at all, Don," she replied.

She moved toward the door; he followed and let her out, and she went back to her own rooms.

CHAPTER XV

Santoine's "Eyes" Fail Him.

Eaton, coming down rather late the next morning, found the breakfast room empty. He chose his breakfast from the dishes on the sideboard, and while the servant set them before him and waited on him, he inquired after the members of the household. Miss Santoine, the servant said, had breakfasted some time before and was now with her father; Mr. Avery also had breakfasted; Mr. Blatchford was not yet down. As Eaton lingered over his breakfast, Miss Davis passed through the hall, accompanied by a maid. The maid admitted her into the study and closed the door; afterward, the maid remained in the hall busy with some morning duty, and her presence and that of the servant in the breakfast room made it impossible for Eaton to attempt to go to the study or to risk speaking to Miss Davis. A few minutes later, he heard Harriet Santoine descending the stairs; rising, he went out into the hall to meet her.

"I don't ask you to commit yourself for longer than today, Miss Santoine," he said, when they had exchanged greetings, "but—for today—what are the limits of my leash?"

"Mr. Avery is going to the country club for lunch; I believe he intends to ask you if you care to go with him."

She turned away and went into the study, closing the door behind her. Eaton, although he had finished his breakfast, went back into the breakfast room. He did not know whether he would refuse or accept Avery's invitation; suddenly he decided. After waiting for some five minutes there over a second cup of coffee, he got up and crossed to the study.

"I beg pardon, Miss Santoine," he explained his interruption, "but you did not tell me what time Mr. Avery is likely to want me to be ready to go to the country club."

"About half-past twelve, I think."

"And what time shall we be coming back?"

"Probably about five."

He thanked her and withdrew. He did not look back as Miss Davis closed the door behind him; their eyes had not met; but he understood that she had comprehended him fully. Today he would be away from the Santoine house, and away from the guards who watched him, for at least four hours, under no closer espionage than that of Avery; this offered opportunity—the first opportunity he had had—for communication between him and his friends outside the house.

He went to his room and made some slight changes in his dress; he came down then to the library, found a book and settled himself to read. Toward noon Avery looked in on him there and rather constrainedly proffered his invitation. Eaton accepted, and after Avery had gone to get ready, Eaton put away his book. Fifteen minutes later, hearing Avery's motor purring outside, Eaton went into the hall; a servant brought his coat and hat, and taking them, he went out to the motor. Avery appeared a moment later, with Harriet Santoine.

She stood looking after them as they spun down the curving drive and onto the pike outside the grounds; then she went back to the study. She dismissed Miss Davis for the day, and taking the typewritten sheets and some other papers her father had asked to have read to him, she went up to him.

Basil Santoine was alone and awake.

"What have you, Harriet?" he asked.

She sat down and glancing through the papers in her hand, gave him the subject of each; then at his direction she began to read them aloud. As she finished the third page, he interrupted her.

"Has Avery taken Eaton to the country club as I ordered?"

"Yes."

"I shall want you to go out there in the afternoon; I would trust your observation more than Avery's to determine whether Eaton has been used to such surroundings."

She read another page, then broke off suddenly.

"Has Donald asked you anything today, Father?"

"In regard to what?"

"I thought last night he seemed disturbed about my relieving him of part of his work."

"Disturbed? In what way?"

She hesitated, unable to define even to herself the impression Avery's manner had made on her. "I understood he was going to ask you to leave it still in his hands."

"He has not done so yet."

"Then probably I was mistaken."

She read again for half an hour after luncheon, finishing the pages she had brought.

"Now you'd better go to the club," the blind man directed.

She put the reports and letters away in the safe in the room below, and going to her own apartments, she dressed carefully for the afternoon.

As she drove down the road, she passed the scene of the attempt by the men in the motor to run Eaton down. The indefiniteness of her knowledge by whom or why the attack had been made only made it seem more terrible to her. Unquestionably he was in constant danger of its repetition, and especially when—as today—he was outside her father's grounds. Instinctively she hurried her horse. She stopped at the clubhouse only to make certain that Mr. Avery and his guest were not there; then she drove on to the polo field.

As she approached, she recognized Avery's lithe, alert figure on one of the ponies; with a deft, quick stroke he cleared the ball from before the feet of an opponent's pony, then he looked up and nodded to her. Harriet drove up and stopped beside the barrier; people hailed her from all sides, and for a moment the practice was stopped as the players trotted over to speak to her. Then play began again, and she had the opportunity to look for Eaton. Her father, she knew, had instructed Avery that Eaton was to be introduced as his guest; but Avery evidently had either carried out these instructions in a purely mechanical manner or had not wished Eaton to be with others unless he himself was by; for Harriet discovered Eaton standing off by himself. She waited till he looked toward her, then signaled him to come over. She got down, and they stood together following the play.

"You know polo?" she questioned him, as she saw the expression of appreciation in his face as a player daringly "rode-off" an antagonist and saved a "cross." She put the question without thought before she recognized that she was obeying her father's instructions.

"I understand the game somewhat," Eaton replied.

"Have you ever played?"

"It seems to deserve its reputation as the summit of sport," he replied.

He answered so easily that she could not decide whether he was evading or not; and somehow, just then, she found it impossible to put the simple question direct again.

"Good! Good, Don!" she cried enthusiastically and clapped her hands as Avery suddenly raced before them, caught the ball with a swinging, backhanded stroke and drove it directly toward his opponent's goal. Instantly whirling his mount, Avery raced away after the ball, and with another clean stroke scored a goal. Everyone about cried out in approbation.

"He's very quick and clever, isn't he?" Harriet said to Eaton.

Eaton nodded. "Yes; he's by all odds the most skillful man on the field, I should say."

The generosity of the praise impelled the girl, somehow, to qualify it. "But only two others really have played much—that man and that."

"Yes, I picked them as the experienced ones," Eaton said quietly.

"The others—two of them, at least—are out for the first time, I think."

They watched the rapid course of the ball up and down the field, the scurry and scamper of the ponies after it, then the clash of a melee.

Two ponies went down, and their riders were flung. When they arose, one of the least experienced boys limped apologetically from the field. Avery rode to the barrier.

"I say, any of you fellows, don't you want to try it? We're just getting warmed up."

Avery looked over to Eaton and gave the challenge direct.

"Care to take a chance?"

Harriet Santoine watched her companion; a sudden flush had come to his face, which vanished, as she turned, and left him almost pale; but his eyes glowed. Avery's manner in challenging him, as though he must refuse from fear of such a fall as he just had witnessed, was not enough to explain Eaton's start.

"How can I?" he returned.

"If you want to play, you can," Avery dared him. "Furden"—that was the boy who had just been hurt—"will lend you some things; his'll just about fit you; and you can have his mounts."

Harriet continued to watch Eaton; the challenge had been put so as to give him no ground for refusal but timidity.

"You don't care to?" Avery taunted him deftly.

"Why don't you try it?" Harriet found herself saying to him.

He hesitated. She realized it was not timidity he was feeling; it was something deeper and stronger than that. It was fear; but so plainly it was not fear of bodily hurt that she moved instinctively toward him in sympathy. He looked swiftly at Avery, then at her, then away. He seemed to fear alike accepting or refusing to play; suddenly he made a decision.

"I'll play."

He started instantly away to the dressing rooms; a few minutes later, when he rode onto the field, Harriet was conscious that, in some way, Eaton was playing a part as he listened to Avery's directions.

Avery appointed himself to oppose Eaton wherever possible, besting him in every contest for the ball; but she saw that Donald, though he took it upon himself to show all the other players where they made their mistakes, did not offer any instruction to Eaton. One of the players drove the ball close to the barrier directly before Harriet; Eaton and Avery raced for it, neck by neck. Eaton by better riding gained a little; as they came up, she saw Donald's attention was not upon the ball or the play; instead, he was watching Eaton closely. And she realized suddenly that Donald had appreciated as fully as herself that Eaton's clumsiness was a pretense. It was no longer merely polo the two were playing; Donald, suspecting or perhaps even certain that Eaton knew the game, was trying to make him show it, and Eaton was watchfully avoiding this. Just in front of her, Donald, leaning forward, swept the ball from in front of Eaton's pony's feet.

For a few moments the play was all at the further edge of the field; then the ball crossed with a long curving shot and came hopping and rolling along the ground close to where she stood. Donald and Eaton raced for it.

"Stedman!" Avery called to a teammate to prepare to receive the ball after he had struck it; and he lifted his mallet to drive the ball away from in front of Eaton. But as Avery's club was coming down, Eaton, like a flash and apparently without lifting his mallet at all, caught the ball a sharp, smacking stroke. It leaped like a bullet, straight and true, toward the goal, and before Avery could turn, Eaton was after it and upon it, but he did not have to strike again; it bounded on and on between the goal-posts, while together with the applause for the stranger arose a laugh at the expense of Avery. But as Donald halted before her, Harriet saw that he was not angry or discomfited, but was smiling triumphantly to himself; and as she called in praise to Eaton when he came close again, she discovered in him only dismay at what he had done.

The practice ended, and the players rode away. She waited in the clubhouse till Avery and Eaton came up from the dressing rooms. Donald's triumphant satisfaction seemed to have increased; Eaton was silent and preoccupied. Avery, hailed by a group of men, started away; as he did so, he saluted Eaton almost derisively. Eaton's return of the salute was openly hostile. She looked up at him keenly, trying unavailingly to determine whether more had taken place between the two men than she herself had witnessed.

"You had played polo before—and played it well," she charged. "Why did you want to pretend you hadn't?"

He made no reply. As she began to talk of other things, she discovered with surprise that his manner toward her had taken on even greater formality and constraint than it had had since his talk with her father the day before.

The afternoon was not warm enough to sit outside; in the club house were gathered groups of men and girls who had come in from the golf course or from watching the polo practice. She found herself now facing one of these groups composed of some of her own friends, who were taking tea and wafers in the recess before some windows. They motioned to her to join them, and she could not well refuse, especially as this had been a part of her father's instructions. The men rose, as she moved toward them, Eaton with her; she introduced Eaton; a chair was pushed forward for her, and two of the girls made a place for Eaton on the window seat between them.

As they seated themselves and were served, Eaton's participation in the polo practice was the subject of conversation. She found, as she tried to talk with her nearer neighbors, that she was listening instead to this more general conversation which Eaton had joined. She saw that these people had accepted him as one of their own sort to the point of jesting with him about his "lucky" polo stroke for a beginner; his manner toward them was very different from what it had been just now to herself; he seemed at ease and unembarrassed with them. One or two of the girls appeared to have been eager—even anxious—to meet him; and she found herself oddly resenting the attitude of these girls. Her feeling was indefinite, vague; it made her flush and grow uncomfortable; to recognize dimly that there was in it some sense of a proprietorship of her own in him which took alarm at seeing other girls attracted by him; but underneath it was her uneasiness at his new manner to herself, which hurt because she could not explain it. As the party finished their tea, she looked across to him.

"Are you ready to go, Mr. Eaton?" she asked.

"Whenever Mr. Avery is ready."

"You needn't wait for him unless you wish; I'll drive you back," she offered.

"Of course I'd prefer that, Miss Santoine."

It was certainly a fine snow storm this vicinity experienced last Saturday afternoon and evening. The snowfall, which was almost a half rain, was the heaviest of the winter, and blockaded the roads for anything but sleighs, which were numerous the following few days. A number of folks who had driven to Britt to attend the basket ball tournament, had to leave their cars there as the roads were impassable The snow being wet, packed hard, and Monday morning saw Main street lined with shovel wielders.

Kinseth's Store News

Don't forget those crackers at 48 cents a box, or the dark syrup at 48 cents either.

This is going to be canned goods week, and we want you to take particular notice of the real honest-to-"goodness" prices that we are making you on canned goods. Now don't get the idea, folks, that just because the price is low that the quality is too, because it isn't. Every can that goes out of our store is quality stuff, and if it isn't you just bring it back and we'll give you either your money back or another can, just as you prefer.

We are offering you this week canned peaches either whole or in slices, black berries, apricotes and Logan berries at 28 cents a can, and plums at a quarter. Besides many others. You know how a few cans of good fruit give you an easy sort of feeling when company comes, or when that vexing question of "what shall I have" comes up, as it does. Better get a few cans at these bargain prices.

And above all, for goodness sake don't forget the store on the corner and be a wise one by saving your money.

COMMUNITY CLUB BASKET SOCIAL MARCH 20

Belmond Loses To Spirit Lake Team

Belmond Boys Put Up Game Fight But Uncanny Basket Shooting Beats Them.

WIN 15 OUT OF 16 GAMES

Belmond's basket ball team met their first defeat of the season last Saturday morning, at the Fort Dodge tournament when Spirit Lake won over them by the heavy score of 46 to 19.

The boys put up a good game, fighting hard, but they were up against a superior outfit, and went down with colors flying. The Spirit Lake team is a cracking good bunch and their specialty is long baskets. With this "heavy artillery" they bombarded the home boys thruout the game, and the boys could not bring a defense to break it. The game started by Belmond scoring the first points, but Spirit Lake rapidly took the lead and held it thruout the rest of the game. Regardless of what position they held on the floor, the Spirit Lake team were able to cage baskets, Madsen being the star for the Spirit Lake tossers.

Spectators at the game state that Belmond was faster, their team work as good, and on short shots they were better than their opponents, but the ability of the Spirit Lake players to throw baskets from long range was far superior and concentrating on this superiority they easily took the game.

In the tournament Belmond drew a bye, and did not play the first day. Spirit Lake eliminated Boone 21 to 12 Friday afternoon. In the evening, Alton walloped Vail 33 to 19, and Laurens took the Fort Dodge team into camp 25 to 24 in an exciting and bitterly contested battle which was the best game of the tournament. Saturday morning Laurens defeated Alton, 28 to 23, and in the evening Spirit Lake defeated Laurens 32 to 26, thus taking the tournament.

Belmond is not feeling blue over the defeat of the boys. They have created a record this season of which any team in Iowa could well be proud. They won every game played up to the Fort Dodge tournament, their percentage of points over their opponents being about 2 to 1. The Belmond team is a fast, hard-playing bunch, and Belmond is exceedingly proud of the record they have made and of the clean sportsmanship they have displayed in every game. They have played hard, and played square. All honor to them!

U. S. EATING MORE SUGAR THAN DECADE AGO

Sugar now is being consumed in the United States at the rate of 5,500,000 tons (raw) annually, an increase of 44 per cent in comparison with pre-war years, according to a survey just completed by the Department of Commerce. Consumption averaged but 3,800,000 tons a year from 1923 to 1914.

The United States leads all other countries in the amount of sugar consumed, the official survey shows.

India stands second on the list. India's present rate of consumption is 3,000,000 tons a year, which is a decrease from the pre-war consumption rate of 3,270,000 tons.

England's present consumption is at the rate of 1,750,000 tons a year, an increase of but 1 per cent in comparison with 1912-14.

Germany ranks with India in being the only other principal nation to reduce consumption. Germany is eating at the rate of 1,400,000 tons a year, compared with 1,460,000 tons from 1912 to 1914. The rate of decrease is 4 per cent.

France, Japan, Brazil and Italy use but small amounts of sugar in comparison with the United States, although consumption is increasing in each. France is eating 850,000 tons a year, Japan 600,000 tons, Brazel 380,000 tons and Italy 315,000 tons.

Italy is increasing her consumption of sugar at a rate greater even than that of the United States. From 1912 to 1914 Italy averaged but 175,000 tons a year. The present rate of consumption is 80 per cent greater than the previous rate—Chicago Examiner.

FORMER BELMOND TEACHER HURT IN AUTO MISHAP

The following from the Forest City "Summit" will be of interest to many Belmond people, as it concerns a former teacher of our schools, Miss Edna Stedman:

Miss Edna Stedman, domestic science teacher in the schools, met with an accident last Saturday between here and Miller that kept her out of school Monday. She had been to Belmond, having gone the day before where she had left her Ford coupe last fall and was driving the car to Forest City. The blinding snow storm overtook her, and those who remember what the conditions were Saturday afternoon, will realize that it was no easy task to drive facing the storm, even in a closed car. The snow made it almost impossible to see, and when she met a car she gave too much of the road and her car tipped over the grade. The people in the other car, did not see the accident.

She went to a nearby farm house in the hope of being able to telephone for help, but found that the people had no phone. Here she discovered that she had a badly cut knee, the broken glass having cut a long deep gash. She bound up the wound and went to the road to wait the coming of some passing car Frank P. Oleson's car finally brought her to town and others went out after the coupe. It was necessary to take four stitches in the wound on her limb, but otherwise she was very little injured, and she resumed her work at the schools Tuesday.

MONTICELLO MUSIC IN BIG DEMAND IN EASTERN COUNTIES

The organization may give other concerts before the weather permits outdoor programs. At its three entertainments it has been assisted by William Weatherwax of Cedar Rapids and Messrs. Beitz and Blanchard of Hopkinton. The local concert was given for the benefit of the American Legion.

Frank Royden is director of the band, which is made up of thirty musicians from Monticello and vicinity.—Sunday Register.

It is understood that the new company will be incorporated, with a board of directors composed of Belmond men. Chris is a live wire and will be a hustler for business.

Farmers Given Instructions On Dairy Feeding And Management By Expert.

A farmers school of instruction in dairy feeding and management was held in the city hall yesterday afternoon, in charge of County Agent Edwards. A good attendance was present.

Prof. Offringa of Ames addressed the audience, giving advice and ideas on the best way to feed dairy stock and the proper management of the dairy business that it may be one of the most profitable sources of farm income. He gave many valuable suggestions, and illustrated his points by figures on a blackboard.

Prof. Offringa was accompanied by Mademoiselle Aydat, a young French girl, who is studing club and extension work at Ames. She came from France last November, and expects to remain at Ames for two months yet. She accompanied Prof. Offringa to see how the work is explained. She will return to France about June 1st, where she will teach the American ways and methods in this work. Mademoiselle Aydat has wonderful praise for the Iowa State College, its facilities, teaching force and methods, and her ambition is to take back to her home country the many good ideas which Ames has to offer.

EX-BELMOND MAN AIN'T AFRAID OF ANY CUPID

E. D. Curtis of Webster City, a former resident of Belmond, was married to Miss Calla Bishop, also of Webster City, at Lancaster, Mo. last Wednesday, Feb. 21. This is the third matrimonial venture of Mr. Curtis.

Several years ago Mr. Curtis, then a resident of Belmond, was divorced from his first wife and soon afterward he was married a second time. Over a year ago he sued in the courts at Webster City for a divorced from his second wife, but she resisted the action and the decree was not granted. Not over six weeks ago Mrs. Curtis No. 2 took the initative and sued for divorce and obtained a decree. Then Mr. Curtis lost no time in hitching up with wife No. 3.

The present Mrs. Curtis was in the employ of Mr. Curtis for over a year before her marriage. She comes from a family of good standing in Webster City.

LEGION STAGES "DAD'S NIGHT"

The Eimbrink Post of the American Legion staged a highly enjoyable "Dad's night" program last week Wednesday evening, when about 125 Legion members and their dads were present at the Legion hall. The meeting opened at 8:00 o'clock, and an address by A. H. Skovlin was responded to by Atty. W. E. Bullard. Harry Newgard gave a short talk, and a couple of Boxing bouts between Joe Kaufman and Glen Thomas, and Ralph Wilcox and Max Baker were highly entertaining. A horse shoe pitching contest was won by Chester Luick and Mr. Benson, who eliminated all comers. A social hour of smokes and eats followed, and everyone present had a very enjoyable time.

OLAF

The Combination sale at this place last Wednesday, was a decided success, a large crowd attending and most everything sold well.

Mrs. Orpha Anderson, Mrs. Geo. Baxter, and Mrs. Clarence Scott, attended a prenuptial shower given for Nettie Benson at the Bert Anfinson home in Belmond last Friday night.

We are sorry that Jake Hess, the blacksmith, has decided to quit work at this place, he having sold his tools at the Combination sale. He was well liked by everyone and his workmanship was fine. This is a good opening for a blacksmith, and one is needed badly.

Martin Paulson was an over Sunday visitor in Belmond.

Nellie DeLaney closed her winter term of school Friday. After one week's vacation she will resume work again.

Before buying your spring ginghams, organdies, percales, etc, you will do well to look at the new line which S. O. Windecker has in.

A FEW DOINGS OF THE DISTRICT COURT

Monitor: County Attorney Jensen in behalf of the state of Iowa filed a petition in the district court against Charles Moon and his mother, Mrs. Sarah Moon, to have them enjoined from operating, keeping, conducting and maintaining a nusiance on the Moon farm north of Rowan by manufacturing, selling and keeping with intent to sell intoxicating liquors in violation of law. Hearing on the temporary injunction was held before Judge Fry at Webster City on March 12, at which time the petition of the county attorney was doubtless granted.

Because defendants in the case of Henry Koehler vs. R. McVicker and R. A. and Mrs. R. A. McNealy have failed to pay the interest on a certain mortgage for the taxes on real estate secured by said mortgage, the plaintiff herein demands judgment for $6487.24.

Guy Bates of Belmond is serving thirty days in the county jail. He was fined for being drunk in justice court and a jury in the district court confirmed the justice and the judge did the rest.

Deputy Johnson accompanied E. F Bishop to Anamosa last week to serve a five year sentence for hog stealing. Before leaving he made some remarks as to what certain people better do or they too would be making a trip to the same place. Bishop had a chance to tell who helped him steal the Sann hogs but refused to do so.

A very sad case from Dows is that of Harry Christensen, a 20 years old boy, who was committed to Cherokee Saturday. He was a very bright lad graduating from high school at the age of 17. A year later he was stricken with spinal meningitis, which gradually weakened his mind.

The following marriage licenses were issued the past week: Edward Franklin Weatherly of Eagle Grove and Katherine Moorhead of Alonzo; George Smith of Lake Park and Iva R. Burrows of Dows.

Special Program To Be Given

Community Affair For Both Old And Young To Entertain Belmond Folks.

BIG SPECIAL PROGRAM TOO

The Community Welfare club will hold a basket social at the library basement on next Tuesday evening. This affair will be a big time for everybody, and all are heartily invited to attend. Both old and young are in it, and the club's holding of the social is a guarantee of a rousing good time.

A special program is to be a part of the evening's entertainment and you don't want to miss the talent that will be there. Of course, all ladies are requested to bring baskets, which will be auctioned off by the best talent in that line in the community. The baskets of the young folks will be sold separately from those of the older people, so each will have a congenial companion when the eats are spread. Coffee will be served to all who want it free.

Here's your chance, folks, to have a good time and to boost the community's best civic organization. The Community club does much for the city and is deserving of loyal suport on the part of everyone. Be there, and help yourself and the club. Don't forget the time and place, Tuesday, March 20, at the library basement.

CENTRAL COLLEGE GLEE CLUB TO GIVE CONCERT HERE

This Glee Cub is one of the noted musica organizations of Iowa. It was organized in 1906, and since then has made some 22 trips to all parts of the United States and to Canada. The club is composed of 13 young college men selected from the entire student body of Central College. The members are an exceptionally talented lot of young men and give a very pleasing program. Their repertoire consists of classical selections, college songs, humorous pieces and old popular melodies, both secular and sacred. Belmond people will have an opportunity of hearing a high class concert when this Glee Club comes to Belmond.

MORE LAWS OR LESS LAWS

Thirteen hundred bills are now waiting in both houses of the Iowa legislature to be enacted into laws in the state of Iowa if their authors' hopes are realized. Eighty bills were introduced last Thursday; 41 the day before. A perfect flood of new laws are pouring in. Nearly every legislator seems to have the idea that he was sent to Des Moines to make new laws.

To this paper, it appear that Iowa is spending a great deal of money foolishly. We are all in bad enough shape now without having several dozen representatives wasting time, effort and money trying to get a bunch of new laws, when about everybody thinks we have too many laws now.

Laws are necessary; we all know that; and perhaps we do need a few new ones to meet changed conditions, but if 1300 odd laws were wiped out instead of 1300 new ones added, we would be better off. This country is getting law-ridden; there is a law—or somebody wants a law—to regulate nearly everything we do. If every man was in jail who has broken one or more of our multitude of laws, there would be no one left to turn the key in the lock.

Less laws, and a more strict enforcement of those we have, will do far more good than a flood of new laws, some good, some indifferent, and the majority useless if not worse. We have plenty of laws now—enforce them better and there will be less need of new ones. It is comparatively easy to get a new law, but getting rid of that law when it proves a fizzle is a horse of another color. Few laws are repealed. If any bright legislator can show us where Iowa needs 1300 new laws, or acts, we would like to be shown. If the next legislature is elected on a platform of law repealing, Iowa will be better off.

A bill was recently introduced in the Iowa legislature to raise the marriage license fee from one dollar, to ten dollars. This is adding insult to injury. Getting married is just like buying a car—it isn't the initial cost, it's the upkeep. And to add any cost to the initial expense is uncalled for, in human, and insulting. The bill was favored by bachelors, which perhaps explains much. If they are going to do this, we suggest that another bill be introduced taxing all unmarried men nine dollars a year—and the nine dollars given to couples applying for a marriage license. This will even it up. They claimed, it is said, that the license ought to be as much as that on a dog anyway, probably on the theory that married folks lead a dog's life. The backers might see it that way now, but when cupid shoots straight and true, and they follow the old, old trail to the court house, that extra nine dollars will look mighty good to them, or it will afterwards if not then. If a couple can scare up nerve enough to trot in double harness these days, to tax them nine dollars for the nerve is too much. If this bill is passed, the only logical thing to do will be to elect nobody but young ladies to the next legislature.

There's always a silver lining to every cloud. Hampton can at least rejoice over the result at Fort Dodge.

It is reported that spring is coming this way, and will arrive sometime in the near future.

If King Tut were alive today he would appreciate the power of advertising.

Just look what advertising has done for a back number like King Tut.

And even the styles this spring are to be modeled after Tut's time. Probably be cause for many "tut, tuts" on the conservative side.

Some folks would be better off if they stuck to playing 500 instead of trying to play 400.

CHANGING CONDITIONS

As an example of changed newspaper conditions, let us refer to our own experience. Many years ago Will Monroe who had learned the printer's trade in Dysart, applied to the Star-clipper for a job as foreman. He said he ought to have $8 per week. He did not insist on that and might have accepted less, but we thought $8 was about right and hired him. Today the average foreman in a country newspaper office draws from $30 to $35 per week. Print paper now costs about six cents a pound. We used to buy it at $2.25. Ink that we once used at a cost of five cents per pound is now close to fifteen. Postage has gone up four times in ten years. Printing machinery is nearly fifty per cent higher than it was years ago. Many kinds of stock used in job printing has doubled. Rents are higher, taxes have increased nearly 100 per cent. Freight and express rates are a third more. The total expenses of the Star-Clipper today are more than the entire receipts were twenty years ago. Yet in the face of these facts the two Toledo publishers are attempting to furnish creditable newspapers at the old price of $1.50 per year. It is impossible and any good business man realizes it and adjusts things accordingly. Either they must put out inferior newspapers or labor without profit. It would be just as reasonable to expect the farmer to supply eggs at the old price of five cents per dozen, or corn at fifteen cents per bushel, or pork at three cents as to ask a publisher to furnish a newspaper these days at the old prices.—Traer Star-Clipper.

In a time of distressing drouth a harassed amateur agriculturist stepped into a shop and bought a barometer. The clerk was making a few explanations about indications and pressures when the customer interrupted impatiently saying:

"Yes, yes, that's all right, but what I want to know is how you set the thing when you want it to rain."

J. G. MacKellar, proprietor of the MacKellar Produce House, informs us that he will soon have his tire factory in full swing. The machinery is expected to arrive any day and when it does the plant will begin operations at once.

Mr. MacKellar will make a cord tire equal to any and with none superior. An expert tire maker will be on hand, anxious to demonstrate to the people of Kanawha and vicinity that "The MacKellar Cord" is indeed all and more than Mr. MacKellar claims for it.—Reporter.

The writer has it on honest authority if not authoritative, that Ku Klux Klan solicitors are working in Clarion in an effort to establish a local klan. There were reports last fall that members had been signed up, but it is doubtful if any of the various reports emanating about the organization, locally, were true. The field was looked over, and investigated, but no definite steps were taken, we believe, to organize here.—News

Morris Voat, who left here for his old home in Belgium last September, returned recently to the United States and this community, having been employed to assist Erick Olthoff during his spring work. Mr. Voat says that conditions for the laboring man have been better than usual there since the war as the government is spending considerable money in reclaiming the war-wrecked country but he thinks this country offers greater possibilities, hence his decision to return. While in the homeland he was united in marriage but due to certain restrictions in the immigration laws he was unable to bring his bride with him, but she will be premitted to join him in July.—Kanawha Reporter.

Dr. D. G. Hoxie and Miss Edith Hoxie returned last Monday from a visit at Fairhope, Alabama. When they left Hampton they planned to visit in Florida but their plans were interrupted as both of them were injured when they were struck by an automobile at Fairhope, and were confined to their rooms there for a few weeks. Neither of them suffered any broken bones.—Hampton Chronicle.

Mrs. W. J. Rosecrans, mother of Mrs. C. E. Barnes, is expected home from the hospital at Rochester, Minnesota, Saturday of this week. She remained at the hospital since her operation of three weeks ago, taking special treatment.—Garner Signal.

Olaf Eliason went to Sheffield, Saturday, by auto for a visit at the home his sister, Mrs. H. C. Ginapp. When the storm put in its appearance Olaf thought it best to head homeward. He succeeded in reaching Belmond but was unable to get any further with his car so remained over there until Monday forenoon when he returned here by rail.—Reporter.

Selling black bass or offering them for sale is an expensive business transaction according to the state fish and game department, which announced that the Fulton market of Des Moines has been fined $55 for offering for sale forty-three black bass. Black bass are now out of season, they cannot be offered for sale, no matter whether caught in or out of Iowa. Only the person who catches a black bass in season may eat it.

Expressive

An English actor was once boasting to Sir James Barrie of the expressiveness of his countenance.

"I can convey anything to my audience without speaking a word," he said.

"Then," suggested Sir James, "will you please express in your face that you have a younger brother, who was born in Shropshire but is now living in a boarding house on the south coast, and who is going to London a week from Monday to call on his sister who injured her ankle crossing Pall Mall as she was on her way to buy a new purple silk dress?"

BLESSED DEATH!

Dr. Charles Park, although a lover of Latin, told at a recent gathering of the protest of a Brown university sophomore against study of the dead languages. The sophomore, according to Doctor Park, pasted the following lines "To the Dead" on the university bulletin board:

All are dead who wrote it.
All are dead who learned it.
Blessed death! They earned it!

COURT HOUSE NOTES

Monitor—Judge Fry disposed of the criminal cases Monday morning, when he passed sentence on four law breakers.

E. F. Bishep, who plead guilty of stealing hogs from the Ed Sann farm and selling them at Hampton, was given a five year sentence at the state reformatory at Anamosa. The judge threw a little scare into the friends of Graegert and Payne when he suggested to Bishop that he tell County Attorney Jensen who his accomplices were in the hog stealing affair and intimated that the board of parole would give the matter more or less weight when his case came before them. While being addressed by the judge, Bishop assented to the proposition, but we understand the "confession" did not reveal much. If it did nothing will be known until the next session of the grand jury. While neither Graegert or Payne could be tried again for the offense lodged against them at this term of court, a new trial might be had on the charge of conspiracy if the evidence warranted.

For his part in the larceny of some auto parts A. R. Woodward of Eagle Grove was given a sentence of six months in the county jail. At the end of three months he is to be paroled to Sheriff Lang under the usual restrictions. Judge Fry gave Woodard some fatherly advice. Among other things said that there was little excuse for such offenses where a young man came from as good a home as Woodward had. McCallum, his partner, plead guilty some time ago and was sent to jail for five months and later paroled.

Roy Nelson of Eagle Grove, truck driver got off with the light sentence of six months in the county jail. His main offense was throwing a poker at Nightwatchman Fisher, which sent the officer to the hospital with an impaired eye. Nelson, with more or less hootch aboard, attempted to call on his divorced wife. She secured the assistance of Marshal Reynolds. Fisher saw the officer enter the home and surmised trouble was brewing and went to the assistance of his brother officer with the above result. Nelson's record on the hootch problem is bad.

Lyal Berger, the 17 year old confessed check forger, did not tell his story to the satisfaction of Judge Fry, so he has taken his case under advisement and will investigate further. In addition to the Clarion forgeries young Berger admitted passing four checks in Fort Dodge, one of which was for $27 for the rent of a Ford car one afternoon.

A verdict of not guilty was returned Thursday in the case of the state vs Gayl Pepper of Dows, who was charged with stealing some furs. His partner, Elmer Haynes was acquitted a few days previous as was reported last week.

Lyal Burger, a young man about 18 years of age who has no home, forged four small checks on J. L. Lundlad, Shupe & Son, Sinclair & Finn, and the Cigar Store last week. He was captured by the Fort Dodge police upon description of the lad being sent to that city by Sheriff Lang. He has plead guilty and will receive his sentence this week. His seems to be a case of a boy going wrong owing to parental neglect. His mother is dead and his father is away out west somewhere.

The case of C. H. Selleck vs E. H. Fordce of Dows to collect balance of $160 alleged to be due on a farm lease was settled without going to trial.

Another case to have been tried Monday was settled out of court when the Central National Fire Insurance Co., allowed Adam Holman the sum of $2050 on his policy. His business building in Belmond was burned last year.

A hearing on the establishment of drainage district No. 195, located near Belmond met with so much opposition Monday that the board of supervisors rejected the petition.

Taxes are now due and must be paid before April 1st to avoid the usual penalty of one per cent a month.

Ruby Toon of Troy township has been granted a divorce from Willys Toon and given the custody of their daughter, Wilma Ruby.

Idella Frakes of Dows was granted a divorce Monday from Jesse Frakes and given the care of their four children. The matter of alimony is to be taken up later.

Mandy, a good cook and an ardent lady voter, expressed confidence in a colored candidate's chances of being elected to the senate.

"But" said her mistress kindly, "the colored population is hardly large enough to swing an election."

"Ah 'nos dat," retorted Mandy, "but dere's times when a dark horse done come through."

FARM NOTES BUREAU

Iowa Has Lively Social

The J. C. Simon home, one mile northeast of Kowan, was the scene of a lively community social Tuesday, March 6th, when the members of the Iowa Township Farm Bureau met for an all day social get-together. This farm home was packed to overflowing by interested farmers who came to enjoy the program.

Prof. H. H. Cornell, Extension Professor of Landscape Architecture gave a very interesting address on "Beautifying the Farm Home." Mr Cornell's lecture was highly appreciated by the people of this community and especially by the farm wives who are naturally interested in having the home and its surroundings well arranged and attractive. Mr. Cornell spent about two hours lecturing and demonstrating to this interested group of people.

The work which Mr. Cornell gave at the Iowa meeting is becoming more popular throughout the state. There seems to be an increased demand for the beautifying of farm homes and making more attractive places in which to live. A number of those who attended this meeting have asked for individual service from Mr. Cornell and he was promised to give personal attention to some of the problems which were brought up at this meeting. Mr. Cornell will be in Wright county again on Friday, April 6th, at which time he will hold demonstrations in Troy and Lincoln townships. The farmers of Troy are planning an all-day meeting similar to the Iowa social.

Orchard-Poultry Demonstrations

On Monday and Tuesday, March 19-20, Prof H. E. Nichols of the horticulture department and Prof. G. W. Johnson of the Poultry department will be in Wright county for the purpose of lecturing and demonstrating on these respective subjects.

The general plan of the work is to have both lectures and demonstrations at the same farm and at the same time. This is accomplished by dividing those present into two groups and while Prof. Nichols lectures and demonstrates to one group, Prof Johnson will lecture to the other group. Many farmers of Wright county have attended the dual-orchard demonstrations and know the general good which comes from such work. Both these men are specialists in their lines and anyone interested in these subjects should not miss the opportunity of hearing these specialists from the extension department.

There will be two demonstrations held each day, one in the forenoon and one in the afternoon. With this arrangement, it is hoped that this work will be distributed over the county. The demonstrations will be conducted according to the following schedule:

Monday March 19, 9:30 a. m. at R. E. Lee Aldrich 5½ miles south and 1 mile east of Belmond.

Monday March 19, 1:30 p. m. at C. B. Tongate 1 mile west of Galt.

Tuesday March 20, 9:30 a. m. at P. Veldhouse 9 miles north of Holmes.

Tuesday March 20, 1:30 p. m. at Alfred Hanson 4½ miles southwest of Goldfield.

The house and banking and currency committee combined the Lenroot-Anderson, Capper and Norbeck-Strong bills into one rural credit bill and reported them to the house on Saturday.

The Lenroot-Anderson bill is the true intermediate credit bill approved by the majority of the farm organizations and is the result of the work of the joint agricultural inquiry commission. The Capper bill was designed primarily to finace livestock loan associations. The Strong bill amends the Federal Farm Loan Act in a number of particulars, the most important of which is the increase in the individual federal farm loan limit from $10,000 to $25,000. The Capper and Lenroot-Anderson bills have passed the senate, the Norbeck-Strong bill has passed the house. Action on this consolidated bill is expected in the house in the near future. It is favored by the farm bureau.

Four national farm organizations sent a communication to the senate protesting against further consideration of the ship subsidy and praying that "measures of vital importance to the farmers of the nation now pending should have adequate consideration before the adjournment of this congress.

President Harding addressed the senate asking that it advise and approve our joining in the international court set up by the League of Nations at the Hague. He would have us join without assuming any legal relation to the league.

The bill permitting higher salaries for leaders in the United States Department of Agricultural was reported from the senate committee The bill has passed the house.

The Sterling-Haugen butter bill, which passed the house, was passed over on the calendar because of the ship subsidy.

Secretary Wallace filed a complaint against Armour & Company of Illinois and Delaware alleging that J. Ogden Armour's recent act in agreeing to take over Morris & Company, packers, is in violation of the packers and stock yards act, Hearings are set for April 2.

Secretary Hoover endorsed Henry Ford's offer to lease the dam and fertilizer at Muscle Shoals.

Tester for Belmond Association

Word was received by the county agent last week from the Agricultural Economics department of the extension service at Ames, that they have finally succeeded in locating a good experienced tester who will be able to start work as the official tester for the Belmond Testing association on March 26th.

We understand that the cow tester, Mr. Walter Moore from Evansville, Wisconsin, is an experienced man in this line of work and he will no doubt be of great assistance to the farmers who have become members of this association. Mr. Moore comes from one of the leading dairy states where the dairy industry has been developed very extensively. With an official tester in our county who will devote full time to the testing of the cows in the association, also to the proper feeding rations, the interest in dairy production will no doubt, gain favor.

At a meeting of the Belmond Cow Testing association, which was held in the city hall Saturday, officers and directors were elected for the new association. Owing to the severe storm and bad roads, there were not a sufficient number of members in attendance at the meeting on March 3rd for the purpose of electing officers. The election of officers Saturday, March 10th, gave the following results:

J. M. Sampson, president; J. S. Bell, vice president; Glenn Baker, secretary-treasurer; D. C. Abel, W. W. Weld, M. G. Luick, directors.

Addresses Eagle Grove Farmers

Prof. E. L. Cady, representing the agricultural economics section of the extension service at Ames, addressed a large group of farmers at the city hall in Eagle Grove Saturday afternoon at a joint meeting of the Eagle Grove Farmer's Elevator company and the Eagle Grove Livestock shipping association.

Prof. Cady spoke in the interests of the livestock shipping association which organization met to elect a new manager and to discuss the marketing of livestock through such an association. Mr. Cady urged the Eagle Grove farmers to sign the producer's contracts in order that the association might have something definite in the way of volume of business in case they wish to bid for any particular market. According to Mr. Cady, the Eagle Grove Shipping association has a volume of business big enough so as to bid for any market.

Mr. Brisbin of Eagle Grove was elected manager of the association. Mr. Brisbin will devote full time to the interests of the association and make every efforts to serve the farmers of the Eagle Grove community in the marketing of their livestock.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

How about potatoes? Is your family tired of just plain mashed, boiled and fried potatoes? This time of year people usually do not relish old potatoes, yet they are a cheap, nourishing food, the regular mealtime "standby". If full food value is to be obtained cook the spuds with their jackets on, as the rich minerals are next to the skin.

Potato Croquettes—1 pint hot mashed potato, 1 egg, 1 T. butter, 1 T. milk, if needed, 2 T. chopped peppers, 1 T chopped onion. Add ingredients and seasoning to potato, shape into balls, roll in egg, then in sifted bread crumbs. Fry in very hot deep fat, drain on paper and serve at once.

During Lent potatoes can be combined attractively with fish, this recipe being called Fish pie. Moisten left over mashed potato with white sauce and line casserole about one inch thick with the potato. Fill center of dish with fish, also mixed with white sauce. Cover with another layer of mashed potato, season, sprinkle with crumbs and put in oven long enough for mixture to become hot.

Potato Chowder is called a one-dish meal: 1-3 cup salt pork fried very crisp add to it 2 cups diced potatoes. ½ cup diced carrots and 1 onion, sliced, ½ cup diced turnip, some pimento minced, 1 stalk celery seasoning. Brown vegetables, then add boiling water to cover them and cook until tender. Add 2 cup hot milk and serve with toasted crackers or bread. Thickening may be added if desired when milk is put with the vegetables.

Embroidery of all kinds will be be used on spring and summer clothes. Wool and silk floss and beads will be used for various designs on suits, dresses, the girdle, wide bertha and on skirt panels. Brilliant colored braids will also trim spring suits, and the patterns are so simple in style that the work can easily be done at home.

In sweeping your carpet, it looks brighter if you work with the grain or fiber of the fabric. Occasionally turn the broom as this makes it wear evenly.

A Temporary Parting

The most famous town in Nevada was fading away in the distance.

"What were you thinking of as you waved your hand so pensively toward Reno just now?" asked the companion of the famous film star as they sat together on the rear platform of the observation car.

"I was thinking of that beautiful old ballad, "Say Au Revoir But Not Good By."

Needs A Nail

A cycling "nut" was riding along when his hat blew off. A passing countryman picked it up and took it to him as he circled around, saving him the trouble of getting off his machine.

"I weally must get some stwing to keep this bally hat on," muttered the "nut" as he wheeled off without a word of thanks.

The yokel's reply was short, but expressive: "Get a nail, guv-nor."

Dawning of Light

The skipper was examining an ambitious gob who wanted to be a gunner's mate.

"How much does a six-pound shell weigh?" he asked.

"I don't know," the gob confessed.

"Well, what time does the 12 o'clock train leave?"

"Twelve o'clock."

"All" said the youthful mariner, a great light dawning on him, "twelve pounds."

SHEFFIELD BANKER GOES TO JAIL

C. J. LeValley and Chris C. Storck cashier and assistant cashier of the recently defunct Farmers and Merhants Bank at Sheffield were bound over to the grand jury at their preliminary hearing before Justice of the Peace D. W. Parks in this city last Tuesday afternoon, on a state charge of fraudulent banking. The charge against LeValley was embezzlement by bailee and that against Storck was securing a signature to a written promissory note by false pretenses.

The case of the State of Iowa versus C. C. Storck was called first. County Attorney Ralph R. Stuart represented the state and called Roy Koenigsberg, a young farmer residing southwest of Sheffield, and H. T. Fuller, vice president of the Iowa Loan and Trust Company, of Des Moines, to testify for the state. B. H. Mallory, attorney for the defense cross examined the witness of the state and when waived examination for the defense. However, a plea of not guilty was entered for Storck. Justice Parks bound him over to the grand jury and fixed the bond at $2,500. Storck secured bonds at once, signed by H. A. Rust and W. E. Storck, of Sheffield, and was released pending the action of the grand jury.

In the LeValley case a plea of not guilty to the charge of embezzlement by bailee was made by the defendant's attorney. County Attorney Stuart called Ole Koenigsberg and N. A. Inglis to testify for the state. The witness were also examined by Attorney Mallory for the defense. Defense in the case was waived and LeValley was bound over to the grand jury and his bond was fixed at $3,500. LeValley was unable to secure bonds and was taken to jail.

The evidence brot out by the state in the Storck case showed that Roy Koenigsberg had been induced to give a number of notes "as collateral" on three original notes signed by him and on which he had borrowed the total of $4,000. There were two notes for $1,000 and one note for $2,000 in the original transaction. Kenigsberg stated:

"I hesitated to make out those notes because I didn't understand what collateral was but Mr. Storck said that there was nothing to it and that I would never have to pay the collateral note nor any interest on it I signed it because I had faith in his honesty."

"Now I have received notices from the Iowa Loan and Trust Company in Des Moines, the Continental and Commercial National Bank in Chicago and the Franklin County State Bank in Hampton that I have notes in their hands which are due, and some of which are past due."

The total principal of the notes which are now outstanding against Mr. Koenigsberg is over $9,000, when his original loan and all the money he secured from the Farmers and Merchants Bank was $4,000.

In the LeValley case the state's evidence brought out the facts that Ole Koenigsberg had given the Farmers and Merchants Bank a check for $200 and a new note for $1,500 to pay for a note outstanding against him for $1,700.

The note was not delivered to him at the time of his payment of it but the bankers promised to deliver it within a day or two. However, they never delivered it, altho Mr. Koenigsberg claimed that he kept after them to do so. Now he is being notified by the Franklin County State Bank, of Hampton, that his note for $1,700 is in their hands and is past due.

All during the hearing LeValley maintained a cool, unconcerned and somewhat defiant attitude and at times during the examination of the witness a broad smile played over his face. Storck, however, looked haggard and worn, and seemed to show many days of worry.

Mr. LeValley and his friends made a strenuous effort up to past mid night Tuesday night to secure bonds for his release, but was finally compelled to give up the task and was taken to the county jail by Sheriff A. R. Atkinson. Dozens of persons at Sheffield and in Hampton were asked to sign the $3,500 bonds for Mr. LeValley's release, and while many of them expressed sorrow for him they could not be induced to stand security for his release until the grand jury meets on April 23rd.

Mr. LeValley secured his bonds and was released from the county jail by Sheriff Atkinson about 5:00 o'clock yesterday afternoon following his confinement in the county bastile Tuesday night and Wednesday. The bond was signed by C. H McNider, president of the First National Bank at Mason City, and Dr. T. T. Blaise, also of Mason City. The latter gentleman is a director of the Liberty Life Insurance Company at Des Moines, of which concern Mr. LeValley has been treasurer during the past several years. —Hampton Chronicle.

A VERY TRUE STORY

By Dr. Frank Crane

I heard a good story the other day. The world's best and most unable wisdom by and by gets itself into a story. When the truth is embodied in a tale—that is, when it is expressed in terms of imagination—then it is "made flesh and dwells among us."

A farmer had become tired of his farm. He had lived on the place all his life. He was born there. When a boy he drove the cows in from the field, gathered apples in the orchard, swam in the creek, carried his books across the meadow and through the woods-pasture to the little box of a schoolhouse down the north road.

As a young man he ploughed and harrowed in the spring, made hay and bound oats in the summer, and hauled fodder to the cattle in the winter.

To the old home he had brought his bride. There his three children were born that were now grown up and gone. He was sick of the place. He dreamed of some nice, quiet spot where conditions were ideal, where he could pass his declining days in comfort.

So he went to a real-estate agent in town and listed his farm for sale. The agent drove out and looked the premises over. He said he thought he would have no difficulty in finding a puchaser, as the property seemed to be in fine condition.

When the farmer got the next week's issue of his county paper he read the real-estate agent's advertisement. It stated that the Perkins farm of one hundred sixy acres was for sale. It was all fertile. A crop failure had never been known. There were forty acres of excellent timber, a good artesian well, plenty of pasture and a charming dwelling-house, with adequate barns, bins, and sheds The place was well stocked with cattle, horses, pigs, and poultry. It was of easy access to the city, and had telephone and rural free-delivery advantages. Any one looking for an ideal farm would do well to consult the agent at once.

The next day the farmer called at the agent's office and said:

"Say, I read your advertisement of my place in the paper, and as near as I can figure that's exactly the kind of farm I've been looking for. I'll keep it myself."

All of which goes to show that it pays to advertise, even if only to satisfy yourself.

WHY A SHIP IS A "SHE"

Here are some answers to the question: "Why do you call a ship she?"

If you ever tried to steer one you wouldn't ask.

Because it takes so long to get them ready to go anywhere.

Because they need so much painting.

Because a ship's got to have its own way or it won't go.

Because ships always come off the ways backwards like the members of a certain sex alighting from the street cars. Because it costs so much to keep one in operation.

Because they are always calling at some place or another.

Because they are forever blowing off steam.

Because they are held together with steel.

HAVE YOU SEEN THE "SUCCESSFUL"?

That's the name of the best incubator built at any price. That's a big statement all right, but our sales the past two years must signify something. In 1922 we sold 39 of these machines. This year so far we have taken orders for 13 and 4 of these go to Mr. Ira L. Christie, who has used Successfuls for years. You should investigate before buying.

You're Always Welcome

It is always open house at our store. Whenever you are in town drop in for a talk. You will no doubt find some of your neighbors here and chances are you will pick up some information that will help you with your farming. Whenever you have time to spare come in and look over our complete line of farm equipment, especially spring lines such as Hoosier Seeders, International No. 8 Planters and P & O Cultivators. We can show you the latest thing in these machines and explain the newest and best labor saving devices. We are the exclusive agents for the complete line of International Farm Implements. We are sure you can find the machine or tool you want in the complete McCormick-Deering line.

We are not so much interested in what well-dressed men will wear this spring as in what hard-pressed men will wear

Don't do it today unless you are sure of being satisfied with it tomorrow.

For a people who boast that they "just muddle through," the British nation has achieved a good deal.

We still have a good supply of bulk seeds to select from. Prices are holding firm but it has always been our experience that the first orders get the best seed. Let us show you.

Since Coue's visit much has been said about "auto suggestion", but not a word about "drive carefully."

FLOOD OF NEW LEGISLATIVE BILLS

(By G. L. Caswell)

Des Moines, March 12, 1923

Back on the job and going strong the members of the House and Senate took up their duties Tuesday forenoon last to continue in the work of legislation until the close of the session, which is usually about the middle of April. We doubt if ever a General Assembly had a greater amount of work cut out for it at the beginning of the last half of the session. Committees have been loafing on the job or delaying matters for jockying purposes, that is evident. Very few bills had committee sanction or were reported out where either house could take action on them when Tuesday came. All the big propositions before this session were hanging fire for some reason.

The House had decided some time ago that no more bills excepting such bill as might be proposed by committees would be received in the House after March 8th. The Senate had extended the time for new bills to March 20th. The House then rescinded the former arrangement and voted to allow new bills till March 20th, also. The result is a continuous stream of new measures, and on Thursday alone there were over 80 new bills offered in both houses; forty-one the day before. Now there are over 1300 bills in both houses, including the Code Commission bills.

And speaking of Code Commission bills: It is the view of some of the members that Code revision has been finally and irrevocably "shot to pieces". The Code Commission bills are replaced by hundreds of regular bills, and there is absolute chaos so far as Code revision is concerned. These members say it is utter waste and foolishness to attempt to do anything further with Code revision now, and to pay out thousands of dollars to maintain members of the Code Commission or anybody else with the attending expense of materials, clerks, printing, etc. No special or any other session can possibly bring harmony of the new legislation and Code revision bills, and the governor would not be warranted in calling a special session for Code work even if he felt inclined to, which is doubtful.

Liquor Bill With Kick

More liquor bills have been written into the laws, or well started on that road, this week. "Persistent violators" of liquor laws are to be subject to a fine of one thousand dollars for a second offense and a penitentiary or jail sentence for a third conviction of violating the laws. Another bill passed by the Senate and championed by Senate McIntosh's committee on suppression of intemperance prohibits the manufacture of, possession of or use of any utensils or implements used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. While the fight aganst this bill was good-natured, and sometimes humorous, it got by with several majority.

The House on Wednesday passed another stringent liquor measure as it came over from the Senate, and this makes it the crime of manslaughter where "hootch" is furnished or sold and results in the death of the recipient. It got a vote of 76 to 12 in the House.

Many hours were spent by the Senate on both Thursday and Friday in consideration of the McIntosh bill changing the time of primary elections from June to August. The bill itself was lost sight of in the dust created by an amendment offered by Senator Brookhart providing for direct vote on presidential preference at the primary. The amendment is along the same lines as a bill offered by U. S. Senator Brookhart providing for direct vote for president at a primary election. Back of it all some of the politicians in the General Assembly say there is a possibility of Iowa having a foremost candidate for president two years hence if the law can be passed by either the national congress or the state legislature. The amendment by Senator Brookhart failed here, however, and there is little chance of the McIntosh primary proposition becoming a law in this state.

Superintendents' Election Again

Election of county superintendents by direct vote of the people instead of by the presidents of the school boards of each county may have been killed in the Senate three weeks ago, but a near relation of that bill has come forward in the House in the shape of a bill by Blake of Fayette county, which will require the election of a county board of education of seven members, and these members will elect the county superintendents if the bill becomes a law. The bill provides that candidate for the board of education shall not be members of any school board, that they shall be nominated and certified as candidates, when the county auditor shall have their names on the certified ballots to be printed in each school corporation. The election will be held at the time of the usual March school elections and the results shall be canvassed by the board of supervisors. When elected the board of education shall every two years elect a county superintendent of of schools, after the year 1924. When the fight over the bill that was killed was going on, some friends of the present plan of electing county superdintendents favored the idea now being advanced in the Blake bill, so its author claims, and he believes this plan will meet with favor.

Representative Rankin of Lee county has a bill that is very important to the people of the state, even though they may not realize it now. That bill provides that state bank examiners shall ascertain whether stockholders in a state bank are financially able to stand a one hundred per cent assessment on their stock if the bank should fail. As the law now stands stockholders are liable for an assessment of one hundred per cent, but some recent bank failures have established the fact that the receiver cannot collect from them, owing to their financial condition, or the condition under which they became stockholders. Thus the depositors and others connected with such banks stand to lose the amount the stockholders should pay.

Senator Abben of Lyon county has a bill also affecting banks, providing for stated pay for bank examiners and with a view to limiting the time of receiverships. The Senate passed the Brookhart bill Thursday last, providing that the rate of interest on various county and municipal bonds hereafter issued shall not be more than five per cent. About two years ago the limit of interest for school bonds was raised to six per cent to help out some districts that needed additional funds badly, but that rate is again changed to five per cent.

Highway Fights Now Coming

The passage of the bill of Representative Rewoldt of Bremer county by the Senate Wednesday indicates the success of some of that kind of proposed legislation. The bill makes it possible to dispense with the services of a county engineer in certain cases. Following this action Senator Buser of Muscatine gave notice of demand for the return of two of his own highway bills from the Senate committee, as they had been there more than the allotted fifteen days. A dozen other highway bills will be on the calendar as a result.

One more highway bill has passed and may become law—The Fackler bill, which passed the House three weeks ago, and on Thursday adopted favorably by the Senate without opposition. This bill permits payment from the primary road fund of the cost of right-of-way and for any other purpose connected with the improvement of the primary roads. An amendment was tacked on in the Senate by Gilchrist providing that where counties have already paid for such right-of-way out of other funds, these funds may be reimbursed from the primary funds. The House will very likely adopt the amendment also.

The House put the Tuck bill through by steam roller methods in a hurry Thursday forenoon, showing what can be done when they speed up. The bill is one to limit the expenditure of county funds to the actual amount of cash on hand. Amendments were offered in the House, but debate was shut off and the amendments killed and the bill passed without ceremony.

One of the big fights will be when the House and Senate bills for removal of the State Highway Commission to Des Moines and the abolishment of the commission and employment only of a state highway engineer come up. There is still a faction in both houses, as there has been in every session for the past eight years wishing to destroy the State Highway Commission regardless of how it is done. Some say that certain interests having to do with road and bridge work keep the matter stirred up. If they can get the Highway Commission removed from Ames to Des Moines it will suit these interests best. It is shown, however, that it will be a much more expensive matter to maintain the commission in Des Moines, as well as costing nearly $200,000 to move it, with all its office force, equipment, etc., and that continuing rentals and expensive quarters in the Capital City would run the cost to a million dollars extra expense in ten years, whereas at Ames the state has the use of office quarters in a college building, and the enormous amount of road equipment is located on cheap lands, with a favorable option of purchase which cannot be duplicated in Des Moines. There are three members of the State Highway Commission at present, and the salaries of two of them are but $1,000 per year each with expenses. The third commissioner is a dean of the college faculty and is not paid as commissioner.

New Bills Introduced

Some of the latest billsl offered in both houses are as follows:

H. F. 612, by Forsling, to appropriate $10,000 for radio market reports by the department of agriculture.

H. F. 623, by Clark and Saunders placing telephone companies under railway commission control and regulation.

H. F. 625, by Rankin, extending term of county officers to four years instead of two.

H. F. 634, by Loverein, to amend the highway improvement laws.

H. F. 644, by Garber of Adair, creating a garage owner's lien for repairs on automobile.

H. F. 642, by Harrison, creating a state literary commission.

H. F. 650, by Anderson of Hamilton county, increasing penalty for violating Sabbath laws from $5 to $50.

H. F. 657, by Gallagher, providing for religious instruction and credits in schools.

H. F. 666, by Carter of Hardin, giving township trustees authority to license shows and pool halls.

H. F. 667, by Brittain, increasing moneys and credits tax to 10 mills.

Senate File 570, by Gilchrist, providing for selection of men and women equally on county central committees of policital parties.

S. F. 581, by Perkins, amending the law relative to registration of births and deaths.

S. F. 586, by Meade, to regulate pool halls.

Senator Reed's bill to provide for permits for persons selling stocks, passed the Senate.

The Saunders bill to abolish fees collected by sheriffs for sale of property foreclosed by mortgage, was accepted by the Senate and will become a law soon.

HUMOROUS DESCRIPTION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA

In view of the fact that Webster City and Hamilton county have for years contributed at least their fair share of the money which annually flows into the treasurey of California, local residents may enjoy the reprinting of the following sketch which has been delivered by a noted actor to California audiences:

Will Martin Cressy, noted actor and sketch writer, has delivered before several California audiences a humorous sketch on California, which is reproduced herewithin response to request of many who have heard it and would like to preserve it for their frequent reading and enjoyment:

"Along about 1840 California really began to advance. A couple of fellows by the name of Lewis and Clark began running cheap excursions out over the Union Pacific railroad.

"The Barbary Coast was made an open port.

"Joaquin Miller and Bret Harte began writing poetry about the climate.

"But the state did not really get its start until a fellow by the name of Marshall started a gold cure up near Sacramento. Inside a year there were 6,000,000 of gold diggers —of both sexes—working there.

"Thus we see that California was discovered by the Spanish, fought for by the Irish, settled by the Yankees—built by the Chinses—owed by the Jews—and run by the native sons.

"With the Spanish in the south, the Yankees in the north and tourists all over it, California had a marvelous growth. In fact, it grew so fast that they had to divide it into two parts: Northern and Southern California. And had to place two deserts and a mountain range in between to keep the two parts from fighting.

The capital of the northern part was called San Francisco. That of the southern portion was called Los Angeles.

"San" means "Saint"—"Angeles" means "Angels." But that was quite a long time ago.

San Francisco, including Berkeley, Oakland, Almeda, Richmond, Petuluma, Sausalito, Mill Valey, Alcatraz Island and the Farallones, is the largest city of the Coast.

Los Angeles, including all the rest of California is still larger.

San Francisco is bounded on the north by Alaska, on the east by Utah, on the south by Hollywood, on the west by the Hawaiian Islands and on the top by heaven. That is by daylight. After dark it has no limits.

The Mount Tamalpais railroad and the San Francisco City hall are the two crookedest things in the world.

San Francisco has more restaurants named for dogs than any city in the world.

Seal Rocks and the St Frances hotel are renowned for the number of sealskins to be seen there on any afternoon.

The rest of the world dates its time before and after the birth of Christ. San Francisco dates hers before and after the fire.

The name of Los Angeles is Spanish. There are twenty-two ways of pronouncing it, all wrong.

It is inhabited by emigrants from Iowa and New England, tourists, real estate agents and movie actors.

Los Angeles is a seaport—situated eighteen miles from the sea. The only wonder in this is that they did not get it through to the Atlantic. For nothing stops Los Angeles.

They were short of water, so they ran a subway somewhere up into Canada and tapped the Artic Ocean.

Then they had so much water they did not know what to do with it. And they annexed another county to use up the water. Owing to these various annexes, Los Angeles is now the largest city in point of farm acreage in the world.

One of the greatest assets of Los Angeles, although it is never mentioned by its inhabitants, is its climate. There are two kinds of Los Angeles climate. Perfect and unusual.

Owing to the fact that all Los Angeles dwellers are either rich or hopelessly broke, it is a great city for amusements. Golf, polo, baseball and bring charges against the Mayor being the most popular.

There are more beautiful women in Los Angeles than any city in the world. But they all come from somewhere else—to go into the pictures.

The imports of the southern or cafeteria end of the state are rubes bobbs, hops, malt and actors. Her exports are oranges, films, cancelled checks and raisins.

California leads the world in hotels, good roads, diversity of beautiful scenery, wonderful press agents, climate, moving pictures, automobile owners, flowers, hospitals and local jealousies.

Oh, but I love California. Love it as only a native son of New England can love. I love its lakes and rills, its mountains and hills, its deserts and seashore. But, best of all, I love its soil. Those lots I own in Los Angeles.

I have an attachment for these lots I shall never lose. That is, it does not look now as if I ever would. The man who sold them to me said I could sell them some time at a profit. But he was a poor prophet. I just noticed the other day that the deeds read " to have and to hold."

But the great dream of my life is sometime to settle down there in my own little bungalow, on my own little ranch and there, in the golden sunlight and the silvery moonlight of California, dream the hours away seeing visions of other places and other times. And where can you find more to recall such visions than a California ranch?

You wake in the morning to the music of a Connecticut alarm clock. You button your Boston garters into your Paris sock, your Danbury hat —and you're up for the day.

You sit down to your Grand Rapids table and eat your Hawaiian pineapple, your Quaker oats, and your Aunt Jemima flapjacks swimming in New Orleans molasses.

Then you go out and put your Concord (N. H.) harness on to your Missouri mule, hitch it to a Moline (Ill.) plow and plow up a couple of acres covered with Ohio mortgages.

At noon you dine on Cincinnati ham, cooked in Chicago lard, on a Detroit stove, burning Wyoming coal.

And then as the twilight falls, you fill up your Pride of Detroit with Mexican gasoline and dash out to the beach and, while sitting in a Greek restaurant, smoking a Boston-made cigar, you watch a New York girl dance the Memphis shimmy to the music of a New Orleans jazz band.

And then you go home, eat a Mexican tamale, smoke a Turkish cigarette, read a chapter of the Bible printed in London, England, say a prayer written in Jersalem, put on your China silk pajamas, crawl in between your Fall River sheets, and fight all night with the fleas—the only native produce of your whole damned ranch."

Hannah's First Sandwich

Little Hannah, returned from her first party, chattered volubly about her experiences. Her home menu had never included sandwiches, and when asked about the refreshments she replied:

"They gave me two pieces of bread and when I opened the door I found some meat inside."

"What did you do with it?" questioned her curious father.

"I ate the meat and gave the bread to the dog," was Hannah's reply.

The Insult Swallowed

Billings, ex-doughboy had a noble war record and a fine disposition, but nevertheless his face was not one to make a woman go into ecstasies. However, he married and raised a son.

"Dad," said the bright young hopeful, "one of the boys at school today said I looked like you."

"I think yo udo too," replied the proud father. "What did you say?"

"Nothin'. He was bigger than I am."

WORDS INCORRECT PROPERLY PART OF LANGUAGE

Charles A. Dana (of the old New York Sun) had no patience with slovenly writing. He knew his Greek and Latin and half a score of other languages so well that the derivation of an English word came to him almost instantly, and he objected to its misuse. The plea that a word was in common use did not appeal to him. He did not heed the dictionary definition. He knew the origin of the dictionary.

He objected to saying of a middleaged man that he was in the prime of life, for the reason that "prime" is from the Latin word "primus," which means first. A man in the prime of life must be a very young man, he said, a man in the first part of his life, writes Chester S. Lord in the Saturday Evening Post.

Likewise, he stirred us up one day by criticizing the use a writer had made of the word "manufactured" in describing something made by machinery. "Manufacture," he said, "comes from the Latin 'manus" the hand, and 'facio,' I make; manufacture means to make by hand, not by machinery or in any other way."

He objected to the use of "dexterity" in the sense of skill, adroitness, aptitude, either physical or mental. "Dexter" is the Latin word meaning the right, and correctly speaking, "dexterous movements" means right-hand movements, was the plea.

"Where is your Latin?" he asked a writer who had said that a political convention had indorsed a candidate. "You cannot indorse a man; you indorse a note or a document by writing on its back. 'Indorse' is from the Latin 'in', on, and 'dorsum' the back. It is incorrect to use it in the sense of a general approval." Some one spoke up to say that under that strict meaning you might indorse a man by hitting him on the back with a club, and the critical lesson ended in laughter.

These criticisms of Mr. Dana's were made and heeded forty or fifty years ago. But like many other words of Latin origin they have come into general use in the ways to which he objected. Usage is amplifying the service of many Latin roots, is giving them wider and more general meaning. "Dexterous" and "dexterity" have come by common consent to mean alert, nimble, physical or mental service of various kinds. We use the word "manufacture" for the making of anything, by machinery or chemical processes or almost any way. We indorse men's sentiments or conduct, the action of convention or anything to which we wish to give the stamp of approval.

"Prime" is in constant use to express vigor, beauty, power, fullness of perfection, maturity.

These uses attest the constant change, the expansion of our language. There is less inclination to hold the language to ripidity of root meaning.

HOME, WHAT IS IT.

By Edgar A. Guest.

Home ain't a place that gold can buy or get up in a minute;
Afore it's home there's got t' be a heap o' livin' in it;
Within the walls there's got t' be some babies born and then
Right there ye've got t' bring 'em up t' women good an' men;
And gradjerly, as time goes on, ye find ye wouldn't part
With anything they ever used—they've grown into yer heart;
The old high chairs, the playthings, too, the little shoes they wore
Ye hoard; an' if ye could ye'd keep the thumb-marks on the door.
Ye've got t' weep t' make it home, ye've got t' sit and sigh,
And watch beside a loved one's bed, an' know that Death is nigh;
An' in the stillness o' the night t' see Death's angel come,
An' close the eyes o' her that smiled an' leave her sweet voice dumb.
Fer these are scenes that grip the heart, an' when yer tears are dried,
Ye find the home is dearer than it was, an' sanctified;
An' tuggin' at ye always are the pleasant memories
O' her that was an' is no more—ye can't escape from these.
Ye've got t' sing an' dance fer years ye've got t' romp an' play,
An' learn t' love the things ye have by usin' 'em each day;
Even the roses 'round the porch must blossom year by year
Afore they' come a part o' ye suggestin' someone dear
Who used t' love 'em long ago, an' trained 'em jes' t' run
The way they do, so's they would get the early mornin' sun;
Ye've got t' love each brick an' stone from cellar up t' dome:
It takes a heap o' livin' in a home t' make it home.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

CHAPTER VII.—Circumstances point to Eaton as Santoine's assailant.

CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on Warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Harriet Santoine to withhold judgment, telling her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers sufficiently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier requires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the position of a semi-prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.—Eaton meets a resident of the house, Wallace Blatchford, and a young girl, Mildred Davis, with whom apparently he is acquainted, though they conceal the fact. Eaton's mission is to secure certain documents which are vital to his interests, and his being admitted to the house is a remarkable stroke of luck. The girl agrees to aid him. He becomes deeply interested in Harriet Santoine, and she in him.

CHAPTER XII.—Harriet tells Eaton she and Donald Avery act as "eyes" to Santoine, reading to him the documents on which he bases his judgments. While walking with her, two men in an automobile deliberately attempt to run Eaton down. He escapes with slight injuries. The girl recognizes one of the men as having been on the train on which they came from Seattle.

CHAPTER XIII.—Santoine questions Eaton closely, but the latter is reticent. The blind man tells him he is convinced the attack made on him on the train was the result of an error, the attacker having planned to kill Eaton. Santoine tells Harriet she is to take charge of certain papers connected with the "Latron properties," which had hitherto been in Avery's charge.

CHAPTER XIV.—Avery seeks to influence Harriet, as his wife to be, to give the papers to him. She refuses. Harriet is beginning to feel that her love belongs to Eaton.

CHAPTER XV.—At the country club Eaton reveals a remarkable proficiency at polo, seemingly to Avery's gratification. Eaton induces Harriet to allow him to leave the grounds for a few minutes that night.

They went out to her trap, leaving Donald to motor back alone. As soon as she had driven out of the club grounds, she let the horse take its own gait, and she turned and faced him.

"Will you tell me," she demanded, "what have I done this afternoon to make you class me among those who oppose you?"

"What have you done? Nothing, Miss Santoine."

"But you are classing me so now."

"Oh, no," he denied so unconvincingly that she felt he was only putting her off.

Harriet Santoine knew that what had attracted her friends to Eaton was their recognition of his likeness to themselves; but what had impressed her in seeing him with them was his difference. Was it some memory of his former life that seeing these people had recalled to him, which had affected his manner toward her?

Again she looked at him.

"Were you sorry to leave the club?" she asked.

"I was quite ready to leave," he answered inattentively.

"It must have been pleasant to you, though, to—to be among the sort of people again that you—you used to know. Miss Furden"—she mentioned one of the girls who had seemed most interested in him, the sister of the boy whose place he had taken in the polo practice—"is considered a very attractive person, Mr. Eaton. I have heard it said that a man—any man—not to be attracted by her must be forearmed against her by thought—or memory of some other woman whom he holds dear."

"I'm afraid I don't quite understand."

The mechanicalness of his answer reassured her. "I mean, Mr. Eaton"—she forced her tone to be light—"Miss Furden was not as attractive to you as she might have been, because there has been some other woman in your life—whose memory—or—or the expectation of seeing whom again—protected you."

"Has been? Oh, you mean before."

"Yes, of course," she answered hastily.

"No—none," he replied simply. "It's rather ungallant, Miss Santoine, but I'm afraid I wasn't thinking much about Miss Furden."

She felt that his denial was the truth, for his words confirmed the impression she had had of him the night before. She drove on—or rather let the horse take them on—for a few moments during which neither spoke. They had come about a bend in the road, and the great house of her father loomed ahead. A motor whizzed past them, coming from behind. It was only Avery's car on the way home; but Harriet had jumped a little in memory of the day before, and her companion's head had turned quickly toward the car. She looked up at him swiftly; his lips were set and his eyes gazed steadily ahead after Avery, and he drew a little away from her. A catch in her breath—almost an audible gasp—surprised her, and she fought a warm impulse which had all but placed her hand on his.

"Will you tell me something, Miss Santoine?" he asked suddenly.

"What?"

"I suppose, when I was with Mr. Avery this afternoon, that if I had attempted to escape, he and the chauffeur would have combined to detain me. But on the way back here—did you assume that when you took me in charge you had my parole not to try to depart?"

She was silent for a moment, thoughtful. "Do you mean that you have been considering this afternoon the possibilities of escape?"

"It would be only natural for me to do that, would it not?" he parried.

"No."

"Why not?"

"I don't mean that you might not try to exceed the limits Father has set for you; you might try that, and of course you would be prevented. But you will not" (she hesitated, and when she went on she was quoting her father) "—sacrifice your position here."

"Why not?"

"Because you tried to gain it—or—if not exactly that, at least you had some object in wanting to be near Father which you have not yet gained." She hesitated once more, not looking at him. What it was that had happened during the afternoon she could not make out; instinctively, however, she felt that it had so altered Eaton's relations with them that now he might attempt to escape.

They had reached the front of the house, and a groom sprang to take the horse. She let Eaton help her down; as they entered the house, Avery—who had reached the house only a few moments before them—was still in the hall. And again she was startled in the meeting of the two men by Avery's triumph and the swift flare of defiance on Eaton's face.

She changed from her afternoon dress slowly. As she did so, she brought swiftly in review the events of the day. Chiefly it was to the polo practice and to Eaton's dismay at his one remarkable stroke that her mind went. Had Donald recognized in Eaton something more than merely a good player trying to pretend ignorance of the game? The thought suddenly checked and startled her. For how many great polo players were there in America? Were there a hundred? Fifty? Twenty-five? She did not know; but she did know that there were so few of them that their names and many of the particulars of their lives were known to every follower of the sport.

She halted suddenly in her dressing, perplexed and troubled. Her father had sent Eaton to the country club with Avery; there Avery, plainly, had forced Eaton into the polo game. By her father's instructions? Clearly there seemed to have been purpose in what had been done, and purpose which had not been confided to herself either by her father or Avery. For how could they have suspected Eaton would betray himself in the game unless they had also suspected that he had played polo before? To suspect that, they must at least have some theory as to who Eaton was. But her father had no such theory; he had been expending unavailingly, so far, every effort to ascertain Eaton's connections. So her thoughts led her only into deeper and greater perplexity, but with them came sudden—and unaccountable — resentment against Avery.

At seven Harriet went in to dinner with her father. The blind man was alone; he had been awaiting her, and they were served at once. All through the dinner she was nervous and moody; for she knew she was going to do something she had never done before: she was going to conceal something from her father. She told of Eaton's reception at the country club, and of his taking part in the polo practice and playing badly; but of her own impression that Eaton knew the game and her present conviction that Donald Avery had seen even more than that, she said nothing. She watched her father's face, but she could see there no consciousness that she was omitting anything in her account.

An hour later, when after reading aloud to him for a time, he dismissed her, she hesitated before going.

"You've seen Donald?" she asked.

"Yes."

"What did he tell you?"

"The same as you have told, though not quite so fully."

She was outside the door and in the hall before realization came to her that her father's reply could mean only that Donald, like herself, had concealed his discovery of Eaton's ability to play polo. Why Donald had not told, she could not imagine; the only conclusion she could reach was that Donald's silence in some way menaced Eaton; for—suddenly now—it came to her what this must mean to Eaton. All that he had been so careful to hide regarding himself and his connections must be obtainable by Avery now, and Avery, for some purpose of his own, was withholding betrayal to make use of it as he might see fit.

She moved once more to return to her father; again she stopped; then, swiftly, she turned and went downstairs.

She looked hurriedly about for Avery. She did not find him, nor at first did she find Eaton either. She discovered him presently in the music room with Blatchford. Blatchford at once excused himself, tired evidently of his task of watching over Eaton.

Harriet caught herself together and controlled herself to her usual manner.

"What shall it be this evening, Mr. Eaton?" she asked. "Music, billiards?"

"Billiards, if you like," he responded.

They went up to the billiard room, and for an hour played steadily; but her mind was not upon the game—nor, she saw, was his. Finally, as they ended a game, he put his cue back in the rack and faced her.

"Miss Santoine," he said, "I want to ask a favor."

"What is it?"

"I want to go out—unaccompanied."

"Why?"

"I wish to speak to a friend who will be waiting for me."

"How do you know?"

"He got word to me at the country club today. Excuse me—I did not mean to inform on Mr. Avery; he was really most vigilant. I believe he only made one slip."

"He was not the only one observing you."

"I suppose not. In fact, I was certain of it. However, I received a message which was undoubtedly authentic and had not been overseen."

"But you were not able to make reply."

"I was able to receive all that was necessary."

She considered for a moment "What do you want me to do?"

"Either because of my presence or because of what has happened—or perhaps normally—you have at least four men about the grounds, two of whom seem to be constantly on duty to observe anyone who may approach. I wish you to order them to let me pass and go to a place perhaps ten minutes' walk from here. If you do so, I will return at the latest within half an hour" (he glanced at his watch) "—to be definite, before a quarter of eleven."

"Why should I do this?"

He came close to her and faced her. "What do you think of me now, Miss Santoine?"

"Why—"

"You are certain now, are you not, that I had nothing to do with the attack on your father—that is, in any other connection than that the attack might be meant for me. I denied yesterday that the men in the automobile meant to run me down; you did not accept that denial. I may as well admit to you that I know perfectly well they meant to kill me. They are likely to try again to kill me."

"We recognize that too," she answered. "The men on watch about the house are warned to protect you as well as watch you."

"I appreciate that."

"But are they all you have to fear, Mr. Eaton?" She was thinking of Donald Avery.

He seemed to recognize what was in her mind; his eyes, as he gazed intently at her, clouded, then darkened still more with some succeeding thought. "No, not all."

"And it will aid you to—to protect yourself if you see your friend tonight?"

"Yes."

"But why should not one of Father's men be with you?"

"Unless I were alone, my friend would not appear."

"I see."

He moved away from her, then came back; the importance to him of what he was asking was very plain to her—he was shaking nervously with it. "Miss Santoine," he said intently, "you do not think badly of me now. I do not have to doubt that; I can see it; you have wanted me to see it. I ask you to trust me for a few minutes tonight. I cannot tell you whom I wish to see or why, except that the man comes to do me a service and to endanger no one—except those trying to injure me."

She herself was trembling with her desire to help him, but recollection of her father held her back; then swiftly there came to her the thought of Gabriel Warden; because Warden had tried to help him—in some way and for some reason which she did not know—Warden had been killed. And feeling that in helping him there might be danger to herself, she suddenly and eagerly welcomed that danger, and made her decision.

"You'll promise, Mr. Eaton, not to try to—leave?"

"Yes."

"Let us go out," she said.

She led the way downstairs and, in the hall, picked up a cape; he threw it over her shoulders and brought his overcoat and cap. But in his absorption he forgot to put them on until, as they went out into the garden together, she reminded him; then he put on the cap. The night was clear and cool, and no one but themselves seemed to be about the house.

"Which way do you want to go?" she asked.

He turned toward the forested acres of the grounds which ran down to a ravine at the bottom of which a little stream trickled toward the lake. As they approached the side of this ravine, a man appeared and investigated them. He recognized the girl's figure and halted.

"It's All Right, Willis," She Said Quietly.

"It's all right, Willis," she said quietly.

"Yes, ma'am."

They passed the man and went down the path into the ravine and up the tiny valley. Eaton halted.

"You don't mind waiting here a few moments for me?"

"No," she said. "You will return here?"

"Yes," he said; and with that permission, he left her.

Both had spoken so that the man above could not have heard; and Harriet now noticed that, as her companion hurried ahead, he went almost noiselessly. She stood still, shivering a little now in the cold; and she listened, she no longer heard his footsteps. What she had done was done; then just as she was telling herself that it must be many moments before she would know whether he was coming back, she heard him returning; at some little distance, he spoke her name so as not to frighten her. She knew at once it was he, but a change in the tone surprised her. She stepped forward to meet him.

"You found your friend?"

"Yes."

"What did he tell you? I mean what is wrong that you did not expect?"

She heard his breath come fast.

"Nothing," he denied.

"No; you must tell me! Can't you trust me?"

"Trust you!" he cried. He turned to her and seized her hands. "You ask me to—trust you!"

"Yes; I've trusted you. Can't you believe as much in me?"

"Believe in you, Miss Santoine!" He crushed her fingers in his grasp. "Oh, my God, I wish I could!"

"You wish you could?" she echoed. The tone of it struck her like a blow, and she tore her hands away. "What do you mean by that?"

He made no reply but stood staring at her through the dark. "We must go back," he said queerly. "You're cold."

She did not answer but started back up the path to the house. He seemed to have caught himself together against some impulse that stirred him strongly. "The man out there who saw us? He will report to your father, Miss Santoine?" he asked unsteadily.

"Reports for Father are first made to me."

"I see." He did not ask her what she was going to do; if he was assuming that her permission to exceed his set limits bound her not to report to her father, she did not accept that assumption, though she would not report to the blind man tonight, for she knew he must now be asleep. But she felt that Eaton was no longer thinking of this. As they entered the house and he helped her lay off her cape, he suddenly faced her.

"We are in a strange relation to each other, Miss Santoine—stranger than you know," he said unevenly.

She waited for him to go on.

"When the time comes that you comprehend what our actual relation is, I—I want you to know that I understand that whatever you have done was done because you believed it might bring about the greater good. I—I have seen in you—in your father—only kindness, high honor, sympathy. If I did not know—"

She started, gazing at him, what he said had absolutely no meaning for her. "What is it that you know?" she demanded.

He did not reply; his hand went out to hers, seized it, crushed it, and he started away. As he went up the stairs—still, in his absorption, carrying cap and overcoat—she stood staring after him in perplexity.

CHAPTER XVI

The Fight in the Study.

Eaton dismissed the man who had been waiting in his rooms for him; he locked the door and carefully drew down all the window shades. Then he put his overcoat, folded as he had been carrying it under his arm, on the writing table in the center of the room, and from its folds and pockets took a "breast-drill" such as iron workers use in drilling steel, an automatic pistol with three clips of cartridges, an electric flashlight and a little bottle of nitroglycerin. He loaded the pistol and put it in his pocket; then he carefully inspected the other things.

He raised a shade and window, and sat in the dark. The night was cloudy and very dark. He gazed at the south wing of the house; the windows of the first floor were closed and the curtains drawn; but tonight there was no light in the room. Then in the dark he moved to the table where he had left his overcoat, and distributed in his pockets and within his clothing the articles he had brought; and now he felt again in the overcoat and brought out a short, strong bar of steel curved and flattened at one end—a "jimmy" for forcing the windows.

Eaton slipped off his shoes and went to his room door; he opened the door and found the hall dark and quiet. He stepped out, closing his door carefully behind him, and with great caution he descended the stairs. He went to a window in the drawing room which was set in a recess and so placed that it was not visible from other windows in the house. He opened this window and let himself down upon the lawn. He gained the south corner of the wing, unobserved or at least without sign that he had been seen, and went on around it.

He stopped at the first high French window on the south. As he tried to slip his jimmy under the bottom of the sash, the window, to his amazement, opened silently upon its hinges; it had not been locked. The heavy curtains within hung just in front of him; he put out his hand and parted them. Then he started back in astonishment and crouched close to the ground; inside the room was a man moving about, flashing an electric torch before him and then exploring an instant in darkness and flashing his torch again.

Eaton had not been at all prepared for this; now he knew suddenly that he ought to have been prepared for it. If the man within the room was not the one who had attacked him with the motor, he was closely allied with that man, and what he was after now was the same thing Eaton was after. He drew his pistol, and loosing the safety, he made it ready to fire; with his left hand, he clung to the short, heavy jimmy. He stepped into the great room through the curtains, and treading noiselessly in his stocking feet, he advanced upon the man, moving forward in each period of darkness between the flashes of the electric torch.

Now, at the further side of the room, another electric torch flashed out. There were at least two men in the room, working together—or rather, one was working, the other supervising; for Eaton heard now a steady, almost inaudible grinding noise as the second man worked. Eaton halted again and waited; if there were two, there might be others.

His pulses were beating faster and hotter, and he felt the blood rushing to his head and his hands growing cold with his excitement; but he was conscious of no fear. He crouched, and crept forward noiselessly again.

No other light appeared in the room, and there was no sound elsewhere from the darkness; but the man who supervised had moved closer to the other. The grinding noise had stopped; it was followed by a sharp click; the men, side by side, were bending over something; and the light of the man who had been working, for a fraction of a second shot into the face of the other. He muttered some short, hoarse imprecation, but before Eaton heard the voice, he had stopped as if struck, and his breath had gone from him.

His instant's glimpse of that face astounded, stunned, stupefied him. He could not have seen that man! The fact was impossible! He must have been mad; his mind must have become unreliable to let him even imagine it. Then came the sound of the voice—the voice of the man whose face he had seen! It was he! And, in place of the paralysis of the first instant, now a wild, savage throe of passion seized Eaton; his pulses leaped so it seemed they must burst his veins, and he gulped and choked. He had not filled in with insane fancy the features of the man whom he had seen; the voice witnessed too that the man in the dark by the wall was he whom Eaton—if he could have dreamed such a fact as now had been disclosed—would have circled the world to catch and destroy; yet now with the destruction of that man in his power—for he had but to aim and empty his automatic pistol at five paces—such destruction at this moment could not suffice; mere shooting that man would be petty, ineffectual. Eaton's fingers tightened on the handle of his pistol, but he held it now not as a weapon to fire but as a dull weight with which to strike. The grip of his left hand clamped onto the short steel bar, and with lips parted—breathing once, it seemed, for each heartbeat and yet choking, suffocating—he leaped forward.

At the same instant—so that he could not have been alarmed by Eaton's leap—the man who had been working moved his torch, and the light fell upon Eaton.

"Look out!" the man cried in alarm to his companion; with the word the torch vanished.

The man toward whom Eaton rushed did not have time to switch off his light; he dropped it instead; and as Eaton sprang for him, he crouched. Eaton, as he struck forward, found nothing; but below his knees, Eaton felt a man's powerful arms tackling him; as he struggled to free himself, a swift, savage lunge lifted him from his feet; he was thrown and hurled backward.

Eaton ducked his head forward and struggled to turn, as he went down, so that a shoulder and not his head or back would strike the floor first. He succeeded in this, though in his effort he dropped the jimmy. He clung with his right hand to the pistol, and as he struck the floor, the pistol shot off; the flash of flame spurted toward the ceiling. Instantly the grip below his knees was loosed; the man who had tackled him and hurled him back had recoiled in the darkness. Eaton got to his feet but crouched and crept about behind a table, aiming his pistol over it in the direction in which he supposed the other men must be. The sound of the shot had ceased to roar through the room; the gases from the powder only made the air heavier. The other two men in the room also waited, invisible and silent. The only light, in the great curtained room, came from the single electric torch lying on the floor. This lighted the legs of a chair, a corner of a desk and a circle of books in the cases on the wall. As Eaton's eyes became more accustomed to the darkness, he could see vague shapes of furniture. If a man moved, he might be made out; but if he stayed still, probably he would remain indistinguishable.

The other men seemed also to have recognized this; no one moved in the room, and there was complete silence.

Eaton knelt on one knee behind his table; now he was wildly, exultantly excited; his blood leaped hotly to his hand pointing his pistol; he panted, almost audibly, for breath, but though his pulse throbbed through his head too, his mind was clear and cool as he reckoned his situation and his chances. He had crossed the Pacific, the continent, he had schemed and risked everything with the mere hope of getting into this room to discover evidence with which to demand from the world righting of the wrong which had driven him as a fugitive for five years; and here he found the man who was the cause of it all, before him in the same room a few paces away in the dark!

For it was impossible that this was not that man; and Eaton knew now that this was he who must have been behind and arranging and directing the attacks upon him. Eaton had not only seen him and heard his voice, but he had felt his grasp; that sudden, instinctive crouch before a charge, and the savage lunge and tackle were the instant, natural acts of an old linesman on a championship team in the game of football as it was played twenty years before. That lift of the opponent off his feet and the heavy lunge hurling him back to fall on his head was what one man—in the rougher, more cruel days of the college game—had been famous for. On the football field that throw sufficed to knock a helmeted opponent unconscious; here it was meant, beyond doubt, to do more.

Upon so much, at least, Eaton's mind at once was clear; here was his enemy whom he must destroy if he himself were not first destroyed. Other thoughts, recasting of other relations altered or overturned in their bearing by the discovery of this man here—everything else could and must wait upon the mighty demand of that moment upon Eaton to destroy this enemy now or be himself destroyed.

Eaton shook in his passion; yet coolly he now realized that his left shoulder, which had taken the shock of his fall, was numb. He shifted his pistol over to cover a vague form which had seemed to move; but, if it had stirred, it was still again now. Eaton strained to listen.

It seemed certain that the noise of the shot, if not the sound of the struggle which preceded it, must have raised an alarm. Basil Santoine, as Eaton knew, slept above; a nurse must be waiting on duty somewhere near. Eaton had seen the row of buttons which the blind man had within arm's length with which he must be able to summon every servant in the house. So it could not last much longer now—this deadlock in the dark. And one of the two, at least, seemed to have recognized that.

Eaton had moved, warily and carefully, but he had moved; a revolver flashed before him. Instantly and without consciousness that his finger pulled the trigger, Eaton's pistol flashed back. In front of him, the flame flashed again, and another spurt of fire spat at one side.

One of the best prices received for blooded hogs this year was that received by Roy Jenison at the Combination Sale last Saturday. Mr. Jenison had a number of spotted Poland brood sows on sale which averaged $95.95. Naturally Roy was pretty well pleased.

J. H. Nourse left Tuesday to join his wife at Fox Lake Wisconsin, where she had been called by the illness of her father, who passed away Monday of this week.

AMERICAN LEGION LECTURE FRIDAY NIGHT

Basket Social Is Enjoyable Affair

Attendance Not As Large As Expected Due to Condition Of The Roads.

MANY HAILED INTO COURT

The Community Club basket social held at the library basement Tuesday evening was a huge success altho, owing to the condition of the roads, the attendance was not as large as had been expected. Fifty-six baskets were sold, and something over $86 realized. This money goes to the club to be used in civic work for the betterment and improvement of Belmond.

The program given was greatly enjoyed, and a very amusing time was had. The high school orchestra furnished music for the evening, which was thoroly enjoyed by the crowd.

A delightful folk dance was given by Kathleen Barry and Lola Harrison.

The cullud ministrels, consisting of Messrs. Gfeller, Wm. Nelson, Nordschow and Varland, pleased their audience with several selections, and then court was opened.

Judge M. C. Barry heard the evidence on a number of cases of violation of community laws, with prosecuting Attorney Pals as the representative of the community. C. O. Fitts and Earl Martin, acting as police, arrested the offenders, and Bayliff H. F. Luick kept order in court. The witnesses swore to tell everything that had no bearing whatsoever on the truth, which they faithfully did. Among others Gfeller was accused of stealing a chicken, and the evidence found on him. Cato Griesy was accused of stealing business from the bus line, and the evidence convicted him. M J. Thoe, accused of having booze, denied the charge, but a bottle was found on him. Marshal Fitts, Judge Barry and Attorney Pals tested the evidence, and after doing so, the case was dismissed because of lack of evidence.

It was a hilarious affair, and hugely enjoyed thruout the entire program by the audience. The Community Club wishes the Independent to thank, on their behalf, all those who helped make the affair the success it was, and the auctioneers for their kindness in selling the baskets.

DISTRICT COURT NEWS NOTES

Monitor.—Mrs. Irene Angnos wife of Steve Angnos, proprietor of the Olympia Candy Kitchen at Eagle Grove, has filed a $2,500 damage suit against John Mulligan, William Cotton and Joe Horn. For cause of action plaintiff alleges tha the defendants above named came into their place of business on the evening of February 12th and started a "rough house" by using loud and abusive language and tipping over a table and breaking the dishes; that when the proprietor attempted to quiet them they knocked or pushed him over while he was gathering up the broken dishes; that when Mrs. Angnos went to her husband's assistance they called her vile names, struck her in the side, bruised and injured her and that she was compelled to call a doctor and remained in bed several days; that at the time above mentioned a party of about thirty persons were being served a lunch following a dance; that the loud, profane and indecent language caused them to leave and for that reason plaintiff's business has been damaged.

REAL BLIZZARD HITS WRIGHT COUNTY SUNDAY

Old man weather sprung a good one Sunday, when after waiting all winter and leading us to think that Spring was coming along soon, he dumped a real nice blizzard down on us. Beginning late Saturday afternoon, snow and a high wind was the portion of this community all Saturday night and Sunday, until about five o'clock Sunday afternoon when the skies cleared. The snow was light and drifting into banks packed hard. Train service was completely shut off Sunday, not a train getting thru until Monday morning. All three roads were blocked. Road travel was practically impossible for anything but sleighs, and in parts even sleighs were unable to negotiate the snow banks until a pathway had been shoveled thru. The mercury dropped to a claimed 18 below Sunday night. The storm was the hardest this vicinity has experienced in years. Stock in some sections is reported to have suffered more or less, and the early robins, of which there were a number, were badly chilled. It is a lucky thing for Belmond that no fire broke out during the storm, for with the high wind, and the snow banks thru which the truck would have had to be pushed, a building would have burned to the ground before the fire company could get to the scene. "They say" this is the last of the season and everybody is sincerely hoping so.

BELMOND SCHOOL NOTES

Division 2 of the Literary gave a program Friday afternoon. They were not able to give their farce as the snow prevented some of the cast from getting in.

Saturday, evening the coaches of the girls and boys basket ball teams entertained the teams at dinner. The party was held at the home of Miss Sharon. A delicious dinner was served after which the evening was spent in playing games. Everyone had a most enjoyable time.

Donald Baker visited Mrs. Hogenson's room Monday and Tuesday.

Viola Mull entered the seventh grade Tuesday.

Mrs. Parker's pupils are returning after being absent on account of illness.

Merle Mull entered the fourth grade Tuesday.

A great number are absent from the fourth grade on account of illness.

Mrs. Chris Enger and Master Billy were kindergarden visitors last week.

A large number are absent from Miss K's room on account of illness.

There were sixteen absent from Miss Murphy's room Thursday on account of the storm.

Josephine Studebaker is absent from the fifth grade on account of the whooping cough.

Ruth Knudson is wearing the gold medal for proficiency in typing for the second week.

THANK OFFERING POSTPONED

The Thank Offering service, scheduled for last Sunday at the Methodist church, was postponed until this coming Sunday, March 25, on account of the stormy weather. The entire service as given in last week's Independent will be given next Sunday.

Mr. Soeth comes highly recommended as a fluent speaker and a man thoroly familiar with the elevator business, and it is desired that all stockholders, patrons and friends come out and hear him.

Miss Kathrine Barrows, English teacher of the high school went to Mason City, Saturday, to spend the week end. Owing to the blockade of trains she was unable to return, and Mrs. M. C. Barry taught for her Monday.

SOLDIER BONUS TO BE PAID IN APRIL

Supreme Court Upholds Act As Constitutional And Payments Start Soon

The Supreme Court of Iowa has handed down a decision declaring the soldier bonus bill constitutional, and it is expected to make the first payments of the bonus direct to the ex-service men about April 15.

The decision was unanimous, all judges agreeing. The bill provides for payment to every Iowan who was in the service during the world war a bonus of 50 cents a day for the time he was in, providing that the total amount to any one person shall not exceed $300. The average amount on the applications which have been made is a little over $200. To pay this bonus, a bond issue of $22,000,000 was voted by the legislature, and confirmed by the people at large in the general election last fall, the vote being better than 2 to 1. The case before the supreme court was a test case to make sure of the legality of the bonds.

The bonds will now be advertised for 20 days, exclusive of Sundays, and the sale of same held probably between April 5 and April 10. Payments in cash will then begin about the fifteenth of April, on the first few thousands of applications.

BIG FARM FIRE AT SPENCER

A recent fire on the farm of A. E. Myrick, near Spencer, resulted in a very heavy loss to that gentleman, and illustrates the foolishness of not carrying adequate insurance. The big barn on Mr. Myrick's property caught fire, from some unknown cause, and the blaze destroyed the barn entirely, together with ten head of horses, 20 head of cattle, a number of head of hogs and sheep, some farm tools and a large quantity of hay. Only about $2000 insurance was carried. The barn was one of the largest structures of its character in Iowa.

HAVE YOU THE LIBRARY HABIT?

"Destined to toil in the rear;
Too busy to reach for the help that was near.
An hour with a book would have brought to his mind
The secret that took him a whole year to find.
The facts that he learned at enormous expense
Were all on the library shelf to commence.
Alas for our hero, too busy to read,
He was also too busy, it proved, to succeed.
We may win without credit or backing or style,
We may win without energy, skill or a smile,
Without patience, or aptitude, purpose or wit.
We may even succeed if we're lacking in grit.
But take it from me as a mighty safe hint—
A civilized man cannot live without print!"

FOUR FARMERS BUY PURE BRED CATTLE

Fine Addition Is Made To Dairy Herds By Wright County Farmers.

C E. Bell of Clarion, A. E. Martin and Hauge Bros. of Belmond made a joint purchase of a purebred two year old Holstein bull at the dairy cattle sale which was held at the dairy cattle congress sale pavilion in Waterloo last Thursday, March 15th.

This animal is a purebred registered two year old individual and is a son of the great K. P. O. P. that made such a record at the state dairy cattle congress last fall, also at the national dairy show at Minneapolis. This animal is a decendant from some very high class dairy animals and will no doubt make a record for his purchasers.

The bringing of such high class purebred animals into our county is a step in the right direction toward increased dairy production and the establishment of herds of purebred dairy cattle in our county. There are those who say that dairy production has no place in our Wright county system of farming but the purchase of such high class dairy animals seems to indicate that the interest in dairy production is increasing.

TELEPHONE FIGHT ON

A big fight is said to be on in the state legislature on the Bell telephone company, a bill having been introduced to regulate the rates of telephone companies, and aimed at the Bell concern. We do not know much about the Bell system of rates, except that they are higher than those charged by the Belmond Telephone Co. Another bill calls for act prohibiting women or girls from being employed to work over eight hours. If this passes, we are informed by Mr. Davenport that it will cause the doing away with night service in the smaller exchanges, as the offices will not produce sufficient revenue to main a triple shift of eight hours each. It looks as tho the author of the bill is rather over-reaching himself, inasmuch as girls now employed in various industries at more than eight hours per day, could be, and probably would be replaced by men if the work required the longer hours; and if not, then a serious reduction in public service would have to be made. Regulation is a good thing, if not carried to extremes which cause an injustified hardship.

GUTHRIE RE-ELECTED

The board of Education at their meeting Monday evening, re-elected W. J. Guthrie as Superintendent of the Belmond schools for next year. Teachers have not been elected yet. Mr. Guthrie has made a good record the past year, and the board's decision will meet with general approval.

TRAIN STUCK NEAR ROWAN

H. L. Hadley, salesman for the Belmond Auto Co., informs us that the "Ping Pong," a Great Western train running from Hampton to Clarion, became stalled in a snow bank a mile and a half east of Rowan Saturday night, and was there until Mondy. The crew and about half a dozen passengers were compelled to stay in the train until Sunday. The fireman attempted to get to a nearby farm house, but had to turn back, as he could not see thru the storm. The engine was kept alive until the water ran out, when the engine was "killed," and passengers had only a small stove in the car to keep warm by. They suffered severely from cold. Among the passengers was a three year old girl, and by wrapping her in overcoats she was kept warm. A farmer finally got to them with some food, and later another started to Rowan with them in a sleigh. He got into a tremendous drift, the horses went down, and help from another farmer and team finally landed the passengers, cold and hungry at the Rowan hotel. A snowplow started from Clarion but it became stuck between towns, and the track was not cleared until late Monday.

SCHOOL ELECTION EXCITING

The election of school directors and treasurer last week Monday was a very exciting affair, 23 ballots being cast. Of these, one was spoiled, leaving 22 good ballots. A. L. Luick and Wallace Ramsay were re-elected as directors, and C. O. Fitts as treasurer.

CONGREGATIONAL SUPPER

The Congregational Missionary Society will serve a supper in the church basement, Thursday, beginning at 5:30, until 7:00 o'clock. After the supper a program will be given, including an illustrated lecture, "China's Great Day." A free will offering for Missions will be received. A very cordial invitation is extended to all to attend this supper and program.

Geo. W. Robb To Give Address

"The Growing Menace" Is Subject of Lecture on Violations Of Liqour Laws.

GOING TO BE VERY GOOD

The lecture by Geo. W. Robb, scheduled for last Wednesday evening, was postponed until Friday evening of this week, owing to the inclement weather. Mr. Robb will deliver his address Friday evening in the high school auditorium.

Mr. Robb is a brother of the famous Sheriff Robb, and was head of the Polk county Booze Squad. As such, he became acquainted with all the angles and evils of the illicit liquor traffic, and his talk deals largely with this and the need of a great change in our judicial system as at present conducted. He has some stirring tales to relate of his experiences in trying to arrest and convict bootleggers and other criminals. To the few who were present last Wednesday evening he gave a short talk, and those who heard him are urgent that all who can, attend Friday evening. The Independent very strongly endorses this lecture, and urges that all its readers who possibly can, be there to hear Mr. Robb. The affair is under the auspices of the American Legion Post here.

BELMOND BALL TEAM RECEIVES HIGH HONOR

Coach Pals of the Belmond basket ball team received an invitation last week from the authorities of the Kansas State Agriculture college at Manhattan inviting the Belmond team to attend and participate in a five-state tournament held there on March 23 and 24.

A very careful survey was made of the records of teams in Iowa, Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, and Missouri, and only those teams which made an exceptional record were invited. In Iowa the teams invited were Belmond, Mason City, Jessup Marshalltown, West Waterloo, Washington and Grant of Cedar Rapids, Osage, Union, Burlington, Keokuk, Oskaloosa, Valley Junction, Ottuwa, Monroe, Shenandoah, Council Bluffs, Spirit Lake, Boone, Fort Dodge, Alton, Vail, and Sioux City.

The winner of this tournament will be invited to compete in the national tournament held in chicago, the first week in April. All teams will be entertained and cared for without expense during their stay in Manhattan.

The Belmond team, altho greatly desiring to go, were forced to decline owing to too many other school activities already arranged for, but the honor is one of which they, and all Belmond, is proud.

FARM RESIDENCE DESTROYED

W. H. McDougall of Kanawha was in Clarion Tuesday looking after his real estate interests, reported the loss of a residence on one of his farms in Norway township. It was destroyed by fire Friday noon. The Harris family was moving off his place, and the J. W. Young family moving onto it, and all household goods were out of the house at the time the blaze was discovered.

Mr. McDougall carried $500 insurance, and estimates his total loss will be around $2,000. He will rebuild the home in the early spring. —News

The city of Eagle Grove could pay every cent of its indebtedness if it were desirable to run the funds so low in the various accounts. The report to be published soon will show a balance on hand of $22,000 with all current expenses paid, including retiring the regular improvement bonds. During Mayor Baker's administration, the last of the water works bonds were paid and several thousand taken off the city hall debt. There is hardly another city in Iowa in as good financial condition as Eagle Grove.—Eagle.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS

The Legal Aid Society of New York City has issued Ten Rules, or Commandments, for wives to follow, that their wedded life may be long and happy. The ten are:

1. Do not be extravagant. Upon the proper and careful expenditure of your husband's income depends his willingness to exert himself for the maintenance of your home. Nothing appeals more strongly to a man than the prospect of acquiring that independence of which a bank account is the guarantee.

2. Keep your home clean. Nothing is more refreshing to the eyes of the tired, nerve racked worker than the sight of a well tidied home.

3. Do not permit your person to become unattractive. A slovenly wife makes a truant husband.

4. Do not receive attentions from other men. Husbands often are jealous and some are suspicious without cause. Do not supply the cause. Friendly attentions from others may be received in a spirit of perfect innocence. When reported by the busybody they become distorted, often criminal, in character.

5. Do not resent reasonable discipline of children by their father. Many mothers assume that all chastisement of a child by its father is severe and unjustifiable. Even just men consider such interference an impertinence. It may easily engender connubial hostilities.

6. Do not spend too much time with your mother. In such case you may easily spend too little at home for the proper administration of your own domestic affairs.

7. Do not accept advice from the neighbors or stress too greatly even that of your own family concerning the management of your domestic affairs. Think for yourself. Have a plan of your own for the solution of home problems. In all cases consult freely with your husband. Much advice of the wrong kind is worse than none.

8. Do not disparage your husband. Your ill advised opinion of him, uttererd in a moment of petulance, may be eagerly seized upon by others as the true measure of his character and abilities. Ideas often become entities.

9. Smile. Be attentive in little things. The smile is an antidote to the toxic effects of ill humor. Consideration for your husband's feelings makes him respectful of yours. An indifferent wife is often supplanted by an ardent friend.

10. Be tactful. Be feminine. Men in last analysis, are but overgrown children. They do not mind coaxing but they resent coercion. Most men prefer their opposites. Femininity attracts and compels them. By the same token masculinity in the female repels.

No rules are given for the party of the second part in the partnership, to-wit, the husband, so we append hereto ten commandments to go with the foregoing:

1.—Do not be stingy. No wife, regardless of how loving she may be, will long endure the task of prying a dollar loose with a crowbar, or of listening to "where's that 50 cents I gave you last week?"

2.—Keep yourself clean. Nothing is harder on the nerves of a woman than the sight of a tobacco streaked chin and finger nails in mourning.

3.—Do not permit yourself to look like a hobo. A rusty husband makes a sharp wife.

4.—Do not flirt with the flappers. Platonic friendship is a ship often wrecked in the sea of matrimony.

5.—Do not punish the children thru a hasty temper. Pick on somebody your size.

6.—Do not spend too much time with the boys. Your wife may have to introduce you to your children Sunday morning.

7.—Do not let the neighbors boss your affairs. If you haven't any mind of your own, the state furnishes a home for you.

8.—Do not make fun of your wife. The chances are you're a great deal funnier yourself.

10.—Be tactful. To bawl out your wife because the beans are burnt won't make 'em taste any better.

A Chicago judge has decided that a man and wife being partners, the wife has a right to go thru her husband's pockets while he is asleep. The men will now begin carrying mice in their pocket.

The folks who have much sidewalk to shovel have been snowed under with work the past week.

It was a mean trick of the weather man to let the robins think spring was here.

SOCIETY

Community Club—
The Community Club's regular meeting will be held next week Thursday, March 29, instead of on the regular meeting day, Friday. The change was made owing to next Friday being Good Friday. Mrs. Van Patton of Fort Dodge will give an address her subject being "The Spirit of the Home." Mrs. Van Patton is a very good speaker, as those who heard her address at the County Federation here last fall will testify. Those attending next Thursday will have a treat in store for them.

Belmond Visitors at Klemme
Boyd Hake, of Belmond, was visiting in Klemme yesterday.

Mrs. W. F. Missman and Mrs. Ely, went to Belmond Saturday for an over Sunday visit, returning Monday.

Mrs. Hake went to Belmond Tuesday for a short visit with her parents.

The Misses Iris Trumbell and Nettie Benson, of Belmond, visited with Klemme friends from Monday until Tuesday evening.

George Ell. of Belmond, was a Klemme caller Monday.

Ben Swalve was a business caller at Belmond Tuesday.

Chas. Busch was a business caller at Belmond Tueday.

W. E. McAlpin, of Belmond, was a Klemme visitor Tuesday.—Times.

Joe Urich says that until last week he had the oldest team of horses in Hancock county, but we suppose the Corwith Hustler will claim that some one down that way can beat Joe's story. Joe had a team of horses that was given to him by his mother when he was married 18 years ago, and one of them was 31 years old this spring and the other was 32. One of them had to be shot last week. Joe's father raised the team, and he said for years that his mother always insisted that he drive this team when she rode with him.—Garner Leader.

We noticed in a recent issue of the Livermore Gazette that at a meeting of their Commercial Club the subject of uniting Corwith, LuVerne, Bode, Kanawha and Livermore with an electric lighting and heating plant was discussed. Outside speakers of authority on the subject were present and discussed the matter with them. The Bode council was also present at the meeting and before disbanding it was planned to call representatives of the five towns together to see if plans could not be formulated for the organization. The poor service we have been receiving is causing the business men of all these towns to look about them for relief and no doubt something will be done this year to insure better service.—Kanawha Reporter.

Mrs. Louis Luick of Belmond came Thursday for a visit at the home of her daughter Mrs. Ross Farmer.—Monitor.

There are but two papers in Northwest Iowa in the same class of excellence attained by the Humboldt Republican, both of which are published in Wright county.—Eagle Grove Eagle.

(One of them of course is the Eagle—but why leave the other seven in suspense?)

Albert Judd. Jr. and Ross Eggers autoed to Belmond, Sunday where they spent the day with friends.—Kanawha Reporter.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Interest in Club Work Grows

The interest in the boys' and girls' club work in Wright county seems to be on the increase. The organization of the Baby Beef club, Poultry club, and the Purebred Gilt club and the prizes offered in these clubs, seems to have created considerable interest among the youngsters of Wright county.

There are at present at the county agent's office about seventy applications for enrollment in the Poultry club and about sixty-five purebred gilt entries, also a number of applications for enrollment in the girls' garment club. The club work in Wright county has grown to such an extent that the county agent is beginning to be concerned as to how his club work can be carried on successfully along with the general work of the farm bureau. It is hoped that with the cooperation of the parents of these youngsters as well as others who are interested in our boy and girls that the work can be carried on successfully and the boys and girls be given an opportunity to get the most out of their club work. Club work is becoming one of the important phases of the farm bureau work throughout the state.

On a tour of the county just completed the county agent found that the baby beeves which are on feed in the baby beef club are in fine condition and that the boys and girls doing the feeding work are highly pleased with the results they are getting in the feeding work. Each boy and girl is keeping a monthly record of all feed consumed by the calf as well as the cost of the feed and in this way the youngster is able to figure the costs per pound of the gains put on during the month. The average gains that have been made by the calves on feed is about two and a half pounds per day and the highest gain which has been reported is three pounds per day for a month period.

Dairy Feeding School Valuable

Prof Offringa of the dairy section of the experimental station at Ames spent two days in Wright county last week conducting the dairy feeding and management schools. The two afternoon meetings which were held in the county, one at Belmond and the other at Clarion were very well attended and intense interest was shown in the work presented.

According to Mr. Offringa too many of the farmers consider the dairy production work as a side line and do not make a study of dairying feeds and feeding. According to his statements a great many of the farmers are feeding dairy cows at a loss because they do not make a study of the balanced ration for the dairy production.

Mr. Offringa is a firm believer in the organizations of Cow Testing associations and spent considerable time in explaining the various problems connected with the cow testing work. He seemed to feel that the organization of the cow testing association is a great forward step in the direction of improvement of the dairy industry in our county. According to Mr. Offringa, Wright county has conditions favorable to In all of his work in the county he urged that more attention be given to the proper feeding of dairy cattle in order that larger and more profitable returns may be realized by those who are milking cows.

Guard Against Oat Smut

Farmers should guard against the sowing of oats which are affected by the common oats smut. The smut is caused by a spore which lives from one season to the next in the oat hull and unless the oats are treated the grain will start out with the handicap of being affected with the smut spores.

It is a very easy matter for any farmer to treat his oats for the common smut by using a solution of one pint of formaldehyde in 40 gallons of water and soaking the oats for ten minutes before draining off the solution. A convenient way of treating oats and then place the bags in about one-half barrel of the formaldehyde solution. The oats should then be spread out upon a floor and covered with blankets or canvass and allowed to stand for from 18 to 24 hours, after which it should be worked over and allowed to dry before seeding.

Test Your Seed Corn

This is the time of year when every farmer should be thinking about the germination qualities of his seed corn. The farmer who has carefully selected his seed corn and stored it properly usually figures that it is not neccessary to test his seed for the coming season.

Experience has shown that the farmer who has the best stand of corn and who produces the largest yield from year to year, is the one who tests his seed corn carefully before planting by giving an individual ear test to determine the germination qualities. Many farmers are content to test their corn by throwing a few kernels into a box of dirt and getting the germination test by the hit-or-miss system in this way, but the farmer who has the best yield of corn is the one who gives attention to the individual ear selection. The kernel of corn which sprouts does not always produce a good strong, vigorous, stalk of corn because often times it lacks the vitality to produce a good stalk and for this reason alone, an individual ear test should be made.

A simple way of testing one's seed corn is by using the "rag doll" method. All that is necessary to prepare a rag doll tester is to take a strip of muslin or other cheap cloth about four feet long and six or eight inches wide and block it off by running one line throught the center of the entire length of the strip and cross marks at intervals of about three inches and numbering the blocks. By using this strip of cloth, three kernels from each ear can be placed in each of the blocks with a number to correspond with the number of the ear. The kernels should be taken one from near the tip end of the ear, one from the center, and the other from near the butt end and in this way insure a representative test of the entire ear. The rag doll should then be rolled up and a rubber band placed about the center and one at each end and the doll then placed in a pail of warm water and set in a warm place from twelve to eighteen hours. The rag doll should then be taken from the water and placed in a warm place with the empty pail covering it. The test can be read in two or three days.

Hen's Feed Affects Hatching

The hatching percentage of eggs can be materialy increased by the proper feeding of the laying hens. Hens whose eggs are to be used for hatching purposes should be fed plenty of green feed and milk.

"Either fresh buttermilk or skim milk is all right," says H. A. Bittenbender, head of the poultry husbandry department at Ames. He suggests the following ration: One one hundred pounds of ground oats red pounds of middlings or shorts, one hundred pounds of ground corn, one hundre pounds of ground oats and sixty pounds of fresh buttermilk or skim milk. Where dried buttermilk is used, forty pounds is sufficient.

Such a ration may be placed in the hopper of the self-feeder and kept before the birds all the time. If the mash is moistened with hot water or with hot buttermilk toward the middle of the morning, the egg production will be increased noticeably during the winter months.

Green feed is another egg producer and should be fed heavily at this season of the year. Mr. Bittenbender gives the following directions for the sprouting of oats on the farm, where an oats sprouter is not available:

1. Soak the oats in a pail for twenty-four hours near some source of heat.
2. Sqeeze out the surplus water and pour the oats into another pail.
3. Turn the oats twice daily until oats sprout and show a growth of half an inch or more.

Treated in this way, the oats will sprout in from three to four days. Start a new bucket to soaking each day. The sprouts should be fed to the hens each noon at the rate of about one pound to every fifteen birds. Mold may be prevented from growing on the oats by using a teaspoonful of formalin to each pail of water or by turning the oats more often.

HOME SWEET HOME HAS ITS 100TH ANNIVERSARY

London, March 21.—(Associated Press)—One hundred years ago next May 8, "Home Sweet Home" was sung in public for the first time. The melody came in the second act of an opera called "Clari. Or the Maid of Milan" produced at Covent garden. The libretta was written by a wandering American actor, John H. Payne, and the music was composed by Sir Henry Bishop.

The opera died and was soon forgotten but the centenary of the imperishable song it bequeathed to the English speaking world is to be observed here.—Des Moines Register.

Bilkens showed up with a set of hand-carved features that resembled the field after Chateau Thierry.

"Pete's sake!" gasped a friend. What happened to your face? Been in an accident?"

"Nope," returned Bilkens sadly. A deaf and bumb barber shaved me and he was feeling chatty."

There are a couple of farmers near Belmond who have over 300 chicks now, which in a few weeks will be spring fries, worth close to 50 cents a pound "on the hoof." We aren't giving the names, because 300 toothsome springs worth 50 cents a pound might tempt someone to take a chance, but doesn't this strike you as a good way to make money with chickens, raising early spring fries.

Enemies Are Evidences of Duties Well Performed

J. A. Zavadil is publisher of the Democrat at Humphrey, Neb. He contributes an editorial page that is a delight to newspaper men and an uplift and an inspiration to his readers. Here is a sample:

"You say you have no enemies. If this is a fact, then you should be ashamed of yourself, for you have never stood up for right against persecution. Had you done these things you would have made enemies. Even if you had done none of these things, but achieved a little more success in your business than your neighbor, if your children were a little brighter in school or a little better behaved out of school, you woud have made enemies, for failure hate success. The man who has no enemies should be ashamed of himself."

US FOR HIM

Give me the every-day sort of a man.
The feller who laughs when he is glad.
Give me the open-faced, big-hearted man
The fellow who weeps when he is sad.
Give me the man who says what he thinks,
The feller whose word is pure gold;
Give me the man who can always be found,
The feller who's not bought and sold.
Give me the man who stands up to the rack,
The feller whose spirit never bends;
Give me the man who is there with the goods,
The feller who stands by his friends.—Exchange.

KUHLERS-WENDELL

Last Wendesday March 14th at the Evangelical parsonage occured the marriage of Miss Reaka Marie Kuhler to Mr. Henry Wendell, both of this place, the Rev. Schlesselman officiating. Only a few of the immediate relatives were present to witness the ceremony, which joined two of our worthy young people in holy wedlock. The bride is the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Heiko Kuhlers and is much beloved for her sweet and amiable disposition, which adds so much to woman's charm, and will make a desirable helpmeet for him who has chosen her. The groom is the third son of Mr. and Mrs. Theo. Wendell and is honored for his steady habits and congeniality, and we think he deserves the love of the one of his choice. We join in wishing these young people a successful journey thru life. They will be at home to their many friends in the near future, on the Theo Wendell farm, the groom having rented the place from his father.

See That Beater!

It's mounted on the axle—that's why the John Deere is easier on you, easier on your horses, does better work and lasts longer.

There are more John Deere spreaders in use in most agricultural territories than any other make. There is a reason. The beater-on-the-axle construction has made possible the only vital improvements in spreader construction since the first commercially successful spreader was built in 1878. The John Deere gives you spreader advantages that have been needed for years.

JOHN DEERE SPREADER

The patented beater construction gives you these distinctive advantages:

1. A box 6 to 10 inches lower than others—much easier to load.
2. High drive wheels—4 to 8 inches higher than others—gives extra traction—extra power. Load moves back to beater on rollers—saves the horses.
3. The simplest spreader built—no clutches, no chains, no adjustments for you to make—reduces repair bills—the spreader lasts years longer.
4. Beater close to ground—does not throw manure high in air—winds do not cause drifting of manure—does better work. Patented revolving rake prevents bunching.

Come in and see this better spreader—there are many other features on it we want to show you.

116,080 FORDS FOR FEBRUARY

Detroit, Mich., March 22.—With 116,080 Ford cars sold at retail in February a new record for the shortest month in the year has been established. February sales exceeded those of January by more than 15,000 and marked the eleventh month in which Ford sales have topped the 100,000 line.

This sales record bears out predictions made at the opening of the year that an acute shortage in Ford cars is certain and this shortage is expected to be felt within next two months with the increased volume of car buying which is always attendant upon the spring months.

Even the high production schedule set at the Ford Motor Co's factory here, which will reach 6,000 cars and trucks a day about April 1st, will be unable to meet the apparent demand for Ford products.

Anticipating a great increase in the demand for Ford cars during the present year the factory here laid plans for increasing production to the 6,000 cars a day schedule and since January 1st had been constantly speeding up manufacture to reach this figure. Demand so far has been of such great proportions as to absorb nearly all production, and stocks in hands of dealers are at present the lowest they have been in months.

February sales of 116,000 cars were made in the face of unfavorable weather conditions in many sections of the country which tied up freight traffic and prevented many deliveries. This was particularly true thruout the northwest, the northern tier of states and in New England. In California, too, cold weather during a part of the month had its effect upon car sales.

Yet with even these unfavorable conditions, the February sales topped those of January by 15 per cent and set a new high record for midwinter selling.

With February the eleventh month in which Ford car sales have gone over the 100,000, the total for this period is close to 1,250,000 cars.

Peak car sales usually are reached during the summer months with drops in the fall and winter. This feature of automobile absorption by the buying public has been completely changed during the last few months thru the activities of the Ford dealer organization which has raised the "peak" line to include every month in the year.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

Appropriate Dress-Women are often tempted to wear colors unsuited to their type because of the popularity those colors.

1. Black or dark brown hair, brown, gray or blue eyes can usually wear blue of all shades, cream, ivory, golden and tan in browns, dark red, blue gray, all other shades of gray and mustard and amber yellow.

2. Olive skin, brown or black hair, blue or gray eyes, black, only when worn with cream collar or touch of color; chestnut and golden brown, navy blue, warm shades of gray, crimson, old rose.

3. Dark sallow type. She must wear the dark and dull shades with touches of bright colored trimming, as rose, flame, orange.

4. Auburn hair with blue or brown eyes takes black, especially in thin materials, rich shades of brown, dull and dark greens, violet, pearl and dove gray, navy, peacock or gray blue.

5. Sallow blondes must be careful in choosing their colors, but they can wear soft gray combined with rich tones, as rose or brunt orange, dark red, navy blue, creamy white, rose.

6. Black hair, brown eyes and dark skin take golden brown, black with touches of color, dark green, pale or dark blue, clear red or crimson, coral, pale or old rose, any yellow.

7. The golden haired girl with fair skin and blue eyes wears black, white, very dark brown, all shades of blue, delicate yellow, pale pink or old rose, warm shades of gray and green.

8. The elderly woman with gray hair should choose for her colors black, if trimmed in color, creamy white, dark blue and violet.

The fleshy figure ought to wear "reticing" colors, as blue greens, blue, brown gray and black, while thin figures need the "advancing" colors, red, yellow, orange, rose and bright blues to increase the size.

If you redecorate your kitchen and pantry walls or woodwork this spring, remember that enamel paint is a little more expensive but it lasts longer and is more easily cleaned because it can be washed quickly with a damp cloth.

GARNER GETTING ALL RILED UP OVER JUICE RATE

A recent meeting of the Commercial club of Garner considered many different things for civic betterment, and in noting the event among other things the Garner Leader says:

The big event of the evening, however, was the report of the club's special committee on electric lighting. This committee was manned by Mayor Pritchard, M. N. Zeiger, Bankers F. M. Hanson and Isaac Sweigard and George. B. Lawhorn. This committee had visited Nora Springs, Mason City and other points and learned considerable about light franchises and rates, all of which they reported to the club Monday evening. There is going to be something doing in the electric light and power business in Garner. This committee found that at Nora Springs users of electric current paid the following rates: Business houses, 10c per KW, residence 12c per KW, power rates 6 and 4c per KW. The distributor of the juice at Nora Springs buys his electricity from Mason City at 4½ cents per KW. Despite the much talked of line loss, operating cost, investment retuhns, taxes, interest, etc., the gentleman who owns and operates the distribution of juice in Nora Springs, is able to maintain a winter home on the Florida beach and a summer home in the vicinity of the Northern lakes, so he must be making something out of the business. The outcome of the committee's report was that the secretary was instructed to etxend an invitation to John Reed, one of the head men of the Iowa Falls Electric Company, to visit Garner and appear before the next meeting of the club for the purpose of explaining why Garner should be required to pay 15 cents per KW for the first 25 KW and 12c thereafter. The business interests of Garner are at this time united into a common mass, and something is going to happen, and that shortly.

THE MISSION OF A NEWSPAPER

A newspaper has a distinct mission to fulfill. This mission to record the news of the community in which the paper is published as faithfully and as accurately as is humanly possible, without bias and without fear.

There are times, it is true, when this mission brings the editor face to face with a disagreeable task. He must either fulfill his obligation to his readers and print all the news or he must adopt a policy of printing only what he thinks they should read. In the latter case he has cut out for himself the most hopeless task imaginable, for when one man sets himself up as the judge of what should be printed and what should not be printed, when he undertakes to say what is news and what is not, when he appoints himself as a sort of unofficial censor of all that is good and bad in his community there will be no end to his troubles.

He will have to suppress all divorce news, all criminal news and all court proceedings. If boys drink hooch in the town he must never mention the fact for that would be unfavorable publicity. If Mrs. Jones shoots her husband and runs off with another man he must not mention the incident for it might create talk over the state and give his town a black eye. If gambling is going on all around him he must shut his eyes, fold his hands and write an editorial on the beauties of nature lest some innocent boy or girl read his paper and decide to go into the business of gambling right away. He would be overwhelmed with requests to "keep our names out of the paper" every time a couple got divorced or a jag party was staged. He would be told that to print these items would hurt the town.

On the other hand he can have a policy of printing all the news no matter what it is or whom it hits, but he can disclaim the responsibility for creating the news. If lightning strikes John Jones' house it is not the editor' fault. He simply records the fact. His paper is the medium through which people learn of the happenings in their community.

If the editor had his own way, all news would be good news. He would have only the Sunday school parties and the ice cream socials and the weddings and such things to record for there would be none of the other kind ever happen, but editors do not have the say about what happens and so the best they can do is to record what does and let it go at that, good, bad or indifferent as the case may be.

As so far as unfavorable pulicity is concerned, there is nothing to it. All publicity is favorable. If good, let us rejoice. If bad, let us change the cause, but the glaring light of true publicity on the acts of mankind have ever been a beneficial thing and should be safegarded and endorsed by everyone.—Exchange.

High Tension Lines To Link All Properties

Line Between Boone and Nevada Will Tie Up Electric Power Plants Of 7 Cities

The last link which will hook up all the properties of the Iowa Railway & Light company, the Iowa Electric company, and the Iowa Falls Electric company will be completed this season when the high tension electric line between Nevada and Boone will be built.

The line will be approximately twenty-eight miles in length and will consist of steel towers and an aluminum line. This lead will go directly north out of Nevada and thence west around the city of Ames and into the Boone plant from the north side of Boone.

When this is completed it will tie Nevada up with the Cedar Rapids, Marshalltown, Boone, Perry, Grundy Center and Iowa Falls power plants and give the company a complete circuit over the state in the various towns where they furnish juice for light and power.

The approximate cost of this improvement will be $75,000 and will be one of the most important pieces of improvement in the way of service provision that has been attempted by the company for some years.—Adv.

LEGISLATORS NOW IN DEAD EARNEST

(By G. L. Caswell)

Des Moires, March 22, 1923.

Legislative matters are now speeded up to near the limit, and the next week will see some of the important matters brought to a decision in both houses. The flood of bills since the March vacation has reached about the usual proportions and committees have now acted upon many matters with their approval or disapproval. The house and senate Journals are now filled with committee reports, and the calendars carry enough work to occupy more time than can be given to general legislative action every day.

Some agitation in official circles was caused late last week when news from the executive session of the Senate, leaked out, to the effect that State Treasurer Burband's office was under investigation. Later details confirmed the first reports and now an expert accountant is employed and at work in the state treasurer's office to ascertain how the books and records are kept and why the balances required under the law have not been kept up each day. The Senate departmental affairs committee evidently ran onto something not exactly to their liking in the treasurer's office, with the result stated. To quiet the rumors and get things straightened out the governor took immediate action by appointing the expert to investigate. Affairs between State Treasurer Burband's office and other state departments have not been as harmonious and agreeable as they might have been, it is said, and the treasurer has been largely "doing it alone."

To Consolidate Some Departments

By slow process of legislative enactment it is possible that at last a few of the minor departments of our state government may be consolidated into one large department. This may possibly result in some economy of operation, and ought to at least result in more efficiency and better results. The Committee on Departmental Affairs worked out the proposition and reported recently in favor of a bill to create the Department of Agriculture in this state. Iowa is one of the few states not having a department of agriculture although it has almost everything else. A head to this department will be called the secretary of agriculture and for the first term he will be appointed by the governor, but at the next general election he will be elected by the people of the state and will be on an equal with the other major state officials. Under this secretary of agriculture, then, it is proposed in the bill to consolidate the present horticultural association, the weather and crop service, the commission of animal health, state veterinarian, the corn and small grain growers' association, beef producer's association, state dairy association, state dairy and food commission, state poultry association, forestry commission, geolopical survey, state oil inspector, board of conservation, inspector of weights and measures, hotel, cafe, ice cream, bakery and other inspectors now swarming the state treasurer's office once a month to draw their pay for trifling service.

Naturally the birth of such a new department comes through much labor, and the Senate spent some hours considering the matter, finally eliminating the geological survey and the conservation board from the provisions of the bill. These two departments are at present handled by men who serve without pay, and do much work for the benefit of the state as a duty they owe to their state.

When the consolidation of these many small departments is finally completed, as it is predicted it will be by this General Assembly, the system of handling all these various state matters ought to be simplified and made at least businesslike.

Eliminate R. and R. Committee

Many experienced members of House and Senate were stunned last week when the Senate voted to eliminate the Retrenchment and Reform Committee, which has been the one state authority to have checking and regulating authority over all state matters during the time the legislature is not in session. This committee has been active in probing some matters, has often reduced or adjusted salaries of employees, authorized employment of help in emergencies, stopped some bad practices that were started, and has even been a check on the governor, the secretary of state and other officials by reason of its connection with the General Assembly. Members of this committee are named from the membership of both houses and heads of the most important committees. They serve without pay other than expenses. Now to do away with this committee, while it may be glorifying to some, stirs many of the experienced members to protest if not rebellion against such action by the Senate. They will make an attempt to prevent the House following the Senate lead in this matter, even if it delays and kills a lot of more important legislation.

New Bills Stop Now

After Tuesday of this week no more new bills can be introduced in either house except bills that originate in the committees and come in as committees bills. Almost every interest in the state will thank Providence for the passage of this time and for speeding the day when a sifting committee will be empowered to sift out the bills that are worthy of final attention and action by this General Assembly, and kill the others.

In the meantime new bills are being dumped into the hopper right along. Usually they cover minor matters and are not essential to the welfare of the state. Occasionally a Code Commission bill is reported out of a committee, but rarely, and there is no change for action on many more of these. Code revision is now an obsolete and by-gone proposition, some members say. There can never be anything done to the remaining Code Commission bills except by another Code committee revising and going through the entire Code and all the supplements and session laws.

Taxation Committee Bills

After working for weeks and spending many hours in considering all points involved, the Ways and Means committee of the Senate has passed out three of the important bills regarding taxation reform in this state. While the vote of the committee was against these bills, still they deemed it fair to place them on the Senate calendar and let the whole body consider them. One of the bills is what is called the administration bill, providing for the administration of the new tax laws. This bill would create a county and state board of review. The others provide for a state budget to be made up each year before the tax levy is fixed and for county and local budgets in the smaller districts.

While this taxation bill is along constructive lines and has been worked over and thought out carefully for two years by able men, yet it is hardly thought it will be adopted in either house of this General Assembly. The discission however, will be enlightening and of future value in taxation matters, and the committee working it out be entitled to the thanks of the people.

Several more highway bills and bills affecting the state highway commission have appeared since last week. One is by Senator Buser and Representative Napier calulated to limit the expenditures of the highway commission to $200,000 a year. The effect would be to cut out most of the engineering work done all over the state.

The House pased the McIntosh bill providing for confiscation of vehicles which may be carrying liquor contrary to law. Also the Buser bill requiring that a large part of the state tax money be kept in the counties until called for by the state treasurer when state funds are reduced to $1,500,000.

Both the House and Senate committees on banks and banking have introduced their measures for regulation of banking business in this state. One provides that the state superintendent of banking shall act as receiver for defunct banks without compensation, and another requires all state banks to accumulate a surplus equal to 20 per cent of the capital stock. A third bill would make it necessary for all new state banks to have a capital stock of at least $50,000 in towns over 3,000 population and $25,000 in towns under 3,000.

Fackler Bill Creates Consternation

When the bill of Representative Fackler of Adams county passed the House several weeks ago, it created quite a contest over the matter of using primary road fund money with which counties might purchase right-of-way, or "for other purposes." The bill passed the Senate last week with an amendment by Senator Gilchrist of Pocahontas county which made it retroactive, authorizing counties which have used other funds for the purchase of right-of-way to reimburse such funds from the primary road funds. The full purport of this amendment was not realized until after the bill was passed, when it was discovered that counties would take an average of thirty thousand dollars each of primary road fund to relenish the county and other road funds, or three million dollars in the whole state. It would be such a lift to county and secondary road funds to have this thirty thousand dollars now that this year's primary road funds would be half used up in the repayment. Thus much road work planned and authorized would be either delayed or stopped entirely. The House, however, promptly accepted the Senate amendment and the bill will become a law on signing by the governor.

The passage of this bill marks the first real victory of the anti-highway commission contingent and they are tickled to death over it.

Many of the populous counties of the state are greatly agitated because of the passage of the Tuck bill limiting their expenditures to the actual cash on hand. It is that many counties have spent large sums more than they have had funds on hand, and have as a result issued warrants that are held at interest until the funds can be replenished from new taxes. The Tuck bill now limits the use of the new taxes so that if the old outstanding warrannts are paid off these counties will have little or no money with which to pay this year's expenses—and they cannot issue more warrants to be held over. A violent protest was made by legislators from many larger counties when the bill passer, but to no avail. Now Senator Holdoegel of Calhoun county has introduced a bill to relieve this situation by making it lawful for these counties to fund and refund their outstanding indebtedness by issuing bonds to cover, and this takes in all indebtedness to 1924. It may be this bill will pass and relieve the situation.

Auto Fees For Big Counties

Coming right back or a bigger share of the automobile license money, these larger counties have introduced a bill through Olson of Clinton county which would permit all counties to retain fifty per cent of the automobile license fees collected. The remainder would be distributed to counties of the state as at present, on the basis of their road mileage. But, as in Polk, Scott, Woodbury, Black Hawk, Linn and some other counties. it would mean thirty to fifty thousand dollars retained by them instead of being distributed equally to the counties of smaller population where fewer automobiles are registered. It is anticipated there will be a deadlock between the House and Senate over this bill.

A most unpopular measure was brought to a vote in the House Monday, when the bill by Ontjes of Grundy county, which would repeal the laws giving exemptions to old soldiers of the civil war, veterans of the Spanish-American war and the World War of part of their taxes. The debate waxed hot and furious, and the author tried to hedge by including an amendment to take away many other tax exemptions now granted under state laws. The bill as originally drawn was forced to a vote by its enemies, and a "call of the House" was put into effect to require every member to be present and vote. Except for those who had been regularly excused all members voted. Only three—Blume, Buffington and Ontjes—voted for the bill, and 97 against it.

Soldiers' Bonus Upheld

A prediction in these letters two weeks ago, that a favorable decision of the Iowa supreme court on the soldiers' bonus law would end the litigation regarding the validity of the law, has now come to pass. On Tuesday the supreme court handed out a unanimous decision upholding the validity of the law under which about $22,000,000 is to be paid to Iowa ex-service men of the late war, based on the lenght of service of each soldier. It is stated by those most intimately connected with the test case that was brought that there will be no appeal from this decision. The state treasurer may go ahead and advertise the bonds for sale and pay out the money to accredited soldiers entitled to the same on warrants to be issued by the state auditor. It is further stated that about April 10th will be the first date possible to pay out any of this money, provided there is no further hitch in the proceedings.

Too Much.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

CHAPTER VII.—Circumstances point to Eaton as Santoine's assailant.

CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on Warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Harriet Santoine, to withhold judgment, telling her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers sufficiently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier requires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the position of a semi-prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.—Eaton meets a resident of the house, Wallace Blatchford, and a young girl, Mildred Davis, with whom apparently he is acquainted, though they conceal the fact. Eaton's mission is to secure certain documents which are vital to his interests, and his being admitted to the house is a remarkable stroke of luck. The girl agrees to aid him. He becomes deeply interested in Harriet Santoine, and she in him.

CHAPTER XII.—Harriet tells Eaton she and Donald Avery act as "eyes" to Santoine, reading to him the documents on which he bases his judgments. While walking with her, two men in an automobile deliberately attempt to run Eaton down. He escapes with slight injuries. The girl recognizes one of the men as having been on the train on which they came from Seattle.

CHAPTER XIII.—Santoine questions Eaton closely, but the latter is reticent. The blind man tells him he is convinced the attack made on him on the train was the result of an error, the attacker having planned to kill Eaton. Santoine tells Harriet she is to take charge of certain papers connected with the "Latron properties," which had hitherto been in Avery's charge.

CHAPTER XIV.—Avery seeks to influence Harriet, as his wife to be, to give the papers to him. She refuses. Harriet is beginning to feel that her love belongs to Eaton.

CHAPTER XV.—At the country club Eaton reveals a remarkable proficiency at polo, seemingly to Avery's gratification. Eaton induces Harriet to allow him to leave the grounds for a few minutes that night.

CHAPTER XVI.—That night Eaton invades Santoine's library, seeking the papers he is determined to possess. There he finds two men, one of whom he recognizes with bewildered surprise, on the same errand. The three men engage in a pistol duel.

Eaton fired back at this—he was prostrate on the floor now, and whether he had been hit or not he did not yet know, or whether the blood flowing down his face was only from a splinter sprayed from the table behind which he had hid. He fired again, holding his pistol far out to one side to confuse the aim of the others; he thought that they too were doing the same and allowed for it in his aim. He pulled his trigger a ninth time—he had not counted his shots, but he knew he had had seven cartridges in the magazine and one in the barrel—and the pistol clicked without discharging. He rolled over farther away from the spot where he had last fired and pulled an extra clip of cartridges from his pocket.

The blood was flowing hot over his face. He made no effort to staunch it or even to feel with his fingers to find exactly where or how badly he had been hit. He jerked the empty cartridge clip from his pistol butt and snapped in the other. He swept his sleeve over his face to clear the blood from his brows and eyes and stared through the dark with pistol at arm's length loaded and ready. Blood spurted over his face again; another sweep of his sleeve cleared it; and he moved his pistol-point back and forth in the dark.

Surely now the sound of firing in that room must have reached the man in the room above; surely he must be summoning his servants.

Eaton listened; there was still no sound from the rest of the house. But overhead now, he heard an almost imperceptible pattering—the sound of a barefooted man crossing the floor; and he knew that the blind man in the bedroom above was getting up.

CHAPTER XVII

Under Cover of Darkness.

Basil Santoine was oversensitive to sound, as are most of the blind; in the world of darkness in which he lived, sounds were by far the most significant—and almost the only—means he had of telling what went on around him; he passed his life listening for or determining the nature of sounds. So the struggle which ended in Eaton's crash to the floor would have waked him without the pistol-shots immediately following. That roused him wide-awake immediately and brought him sitting up in bed, forgetful of his own condition.

His hand went at once to the bell-board, and he rang at the same time for the nurse outside his door and for the steward.

Santoine did not consider the possibility of robbery of plate or jewelry long enough to have been said to consider it at all; what he felt was that the threat which had been hanging vaguely over himself ever since Warden's murder was being fulfilled. But it was not Santoine himself that was being attacked; it was something Santoine possessed. There was only one sort of valuable article for which one might enter that room below. And those articles—

Santoine pressed all the bells again and then got up. He had heard absolutely no sound outside, as must be made by anyone escaping from the room below; but the battle seemed over. One side must have destroyed the other.

The blind man stood barefooted on the floor, his hands clasping in one of the bitterest moments of his rebellion against, and defiance of, his helplessness of blindness. Below him—as he believed—his servants had been sacrificing life for him; there in that room he held in trust that which affected the security, the faith, the honor of others; his guarding that trust involved his honor no less. And particularly, now, he knew he was bound, at whatever cost, to act; for he did not doubt now but that his half-prisoned guest, whom Santoine had not sufficiently guarded, was at the bottom of the attack. The blind man believed, therefore, that it was because of his own retention here of Eaton that the attack had been made, his servants had been killed, the private secrets of his associates were in danger. Undoubtedly there was danger below; but that was why he did not call again at the other door for some one else to run a risk for him.

He put his hand on the rail and started to descend the stairs. He was almost steady in step and he had firm grasp on the rail; he noticed that now to wonder at it. When he had aroused at the sound of firing, his blindness, as always when something was happening about him, was obtruded upon him. He felt helpless because he was blind, not because he had been injured. He had forgotten entirely that for almost two weeks he had not stirred from bed; he had risen and stood and walked, without staggering, to the door and to the top of the stairs before, now, he remembered. So what he already had done showed him that he had merely again to put his injury from his mind and he could go on. He went down the stairs almost steadily.

The blind count stairs, and he had gone down twenty-one—and realized fully his futility; but now he would not retreat or merely call for help.

"Who is here?" he asked distinctly. "Is anyone here? Who is here?"

No one answered. And now Santoine knew by the sense which let him feel whether it was night or day, that the room was really dark—dark for others as well as for himself; the lights were not burning. So an exaltation, a sense of physical capability, came to Santoine; in the dark he was as fit, as capable as any other man.

He stepped down on the floor, and in his uncertainty as to the position of the furniture, felt along the wall. There were bookcases there, but he felt and passed along them swiftly, until he came to the case which concealed the safe at the left side of the doors. The books were gone from that case; his bare toes struck against them where they had been thrown down on the floor. The blind man, his pulse beating tumultuously, put his hand through the case and felt the panel behind. That was slid back, exposing the safe; and the door of the safe stood open. Santoine's hands felt within the safe swiftly. The safe was empty.

He recoiled from it, choking back an ejaculation. The entry to this room had been made for the purpose which he supposed; and the thieves must have succeeded in their errand. The blind man, in his uselessness for pursuit, could delay calling others to act for him no longer. He started toward the bell, when some scrape on the floor—not of the sort to be accounted for by an object moved by the wind—sounded behind him. Santoine swung toward the sound and stood listening again; and then, groping with his hands stretched out before him, he left the wall and stepped toward the center of the room. He took two steps—three, four—with no result; then his foot trod into some fluid, thick and sticky and not cold.

Santoine stooped and put a fingertip into the fluid and brought it near his nose. It was what he supposed it must be—blood. He could hear now someone breathing—more than one person. From the house, still shut off by its double, sound-proof doors, he could hear nothing; but someone outside the house was hurrying up to the open window at the south end of the room.

That one came to, or just inside the window, parting the curtains. He was breathing hard from exertion or from excitement.

"Who is it?" Santoine challenged clearly.

"Basil!" Blatchford's voice exclaimed his recognition in amazement. "Basil; that is you! What are you doing down here?" Blatchford started forward.

"What brought you here?" Santoine demanded instead of reply. "You were running outside; why? What was out there? What did you see?"

"See? I didn't see anything—except the window here open when I came up. But I heard shots, Basil. What has happened here?"

Santoine felt again the stickiness at his feet. "Three or four persons fought in this room, Wallace. Some—or one was hurt. There's blood on the floor. There are two here I can hear breathing; I suppose they're hurt. Probably the rest are gone. Get help. I think those who aren't hurt are gone. They must be gone. But—get help first, Wallace."

"And leave you here?" Blatchford rejoined. He had not halted again; the blind man heard his cousin still moving along the wall. The electric switch clicked, and Santoine knew that the room was flooded with light. Santoine straightened, strained, turning his head a little better to listen. With the flashing on of the light, he had heard the sharp, involuntary start of Blatchford as he saw the room; and, besides that, Santoine heard movement now elsewhere in the room. Then the blind man heard his friend's cry. "Good God!"

"What is it?" Santoine cried.

"Good God! Basil!"

"Who is it, Wallace?" the blind man knew now that his friend's incoherence came from recognition of someone, not alone from some sight of horror.

"Basil! It is—it must be—I know him! It is—"

A shot roared in front of Santoine. The blind man, starting back at the shock of it, drew in the powder-gas with his breath; but the bullet was not for him. Instead, he heard his friend scream and choke and half call, half cough.

"Wallace!" Santoine cried out; but his voice was lost in the roar of another shot. This was not fired by the same one who had just fired; at least, it was not from the same part of the room; and instantly, from another side, a third shot came. Then, in the midst of rush and confusion, another shot roared; the light was out again; then all was gone; the noise was outside; the room was still except for a cough and choke as Blatchford—somewhere on the floor in front of the blind man—tried again to speak.

Basil Santoine, groping with his hands, found him. He was still conscious. Santoine knew that he was trying his best to speak, to say just one word—a name—to tell whom he had seen and who had shot him; but he could not.

Santoine put his hand over a hand of his cousin. Blatchford's fingers closed tightly on Santoine's; they did not relax but now remained closed, though without strength. The blind man bowed and then lifted his head. His friend was dead, and others were rushing into the room—the butler, one of the chauffeurs, Avery, more menservants; the light was on again, and amid the tumult and alarms of the discoveries shown by the light, some rushed to the windows to the south in pursuit of those who had escaped from the room. Avery and one or two others rushed up to Santoine; now the blind man heard, above their cries and alarms, the voice of his daughter. She was beside him, where he knelt next the body of Blatchford, and she put back others who crowded about.

"Father! What has happened? Why are you here? Oh, Father, Cousin Wallace!"

"He is dead," Santoine said. "They shot him! They were three, at least. One was not with the others. They fired at each other, I believe, after one shot him." Santoine's hand was still in Blatchford's. "I heard them below." He told shortly how he had gone down, how Blatchford had entered and been shot.

The blind man, still kneeling, heard the ordering and organizing of others for the pursuit; now women servants from the other part of the house were taking charge of affairs in the room. There had been no signal heard, Santoine was told, upon any of the bells which he had tried to ring from his room. Eaton was the only person from the house who was missing.

"They came, at least some of them came"—Santoine had risen, fighting down his grief over his cousin's death—"for what was in your safe, Harriet."

"I know; I saw it open."

"What is gone?" Santoine demanded.

He heard her picking up the contents of the safe from the floor and carrying them to the table and examining them.

"Why—nearly all the formal papers seem to be gone; lists and agreements relating to a dozen different things."

"None of the correspondence?"

"No; that all seems to be here."

Santoine was breathing quickly; the trust for which he had been ready to die—for which Blatchford had died—seemed safe.

"We don't know whether he got it, then, or not!" It was Avery's voice which broke in upon him; Santoine merely listened.

"He? Who?" He heard his daughter's challenge.

"Why, Eaton. It is plain enough what happened here, isn't it?" Avery answered. "He came here to this room for what he was after—for what he has been after from the first—whatever that may have been! He came prepared to force the safe and get it! But he was surprised—"

"By whom?" the blind man asked.

"By whoever it is that has been following him. I don't attempt to explain who they were, Mr. Santoine; for I don't know. But—whoever they were—in doing this, he laid himself open to attack by them. They were watching—saw him enter here. They attacked him here. Wallace switched on the light and recognized him; so he shot Wallace and ran with whatever he could grab up of the contents of the safe, hoping that by luck he'd get what he was after."

"It isn't so—it isn't so!" Harriet denied.

Her father checked her; he stood an instant thoughtful. "Who is directing the pursuit, Donald?" he asked.

Avery went out at once. The blind man turned to his daughter.

"Now, Harriet," he commanded. She understood that her father would not move till she had seen the room for him.

"There was some sort of a struggle near my safe," she said. "Chairs—everything there is knocked about."

"Yes."

"There is also blood there—a big spot of it on the floor."

"I found that," said Santoine.

"There are bullet marks everywhere—above the mantel, all about."

"How was the safe opened?"

"The combination has been cut completely away; there is an—an instrument connected with the electric-light fixture which seems to have done the cutting. There is a hand-drill, too—I think it is a hand-drill. The inner door has been drilled through, and the catches drawn back."

"Who is this?"

The valet, who had been sent to Eaton's room, had returned with his report. "Mr. Eaton went from his room fully dressed, sir," he said to Santoine, "except for his shoes. I found all his shoes in his room."

During the report the blind man felt his daughter's grasp on his arm become tense and relax and tighten again. Then, as though she realized she was adding to his comprehension of what she had already betrayed, she suddenly took her hand from her father's arm. Santoine let the servants, at his daughter's direction, help him to his room. His daughter stood beside him while the nurse washed the blood-splotches from his hands and feet. When the nurse had finished, he still felt his daughter's presence; she drew nearer to him.

"Father?" she questioned.

"Yes."

"You don't agree with Donald, do you?—that Mr. Eaton went to the study to—to get something, and that whoever has been following him found him there and—and interrupted him and he killed Cousin Wallace?"

Santoine was silent an instant. "That seems the correct explanation, Harriet," he evaded. "It does not fully explain; but it seems correct as far as it goes. If Donald asks you what my opinion is, tell him it is that."

He felt his daughter shrink away from him.

The blind man made no move to draw her back to him; he lay perfectly still; his head rested flat upon the pillows; his hands were clasped tightly together above the coverlet. He had accused himself, in the room below, because, by the manner he had chosen to treat Eaton, he had slain the man he loved best and had forced a friendship with Eaton on his daughter which, he saw, had gone further than mere friendship; it had gone, he knew now, even to the irretrievable between man and woman—had brought her, that is, to the state where, no matter what Eaton was or did, she must suffer with him! But Santoine was not accusing himself now; he was feeling only the fulfillment of that threat against those who had trusted him with their secrets, which he had felt vaguely after the murder of Gabriel Warden and, more plainly with the events of each succeeding day, ever since. For that threat, just now, had culminated in his presence in purposeful, violent action; but Santoine in his blindness had been unable—and was still unable—to tell what that action meant.

CHAPTER XVIII

Pursuit.

Harriet Santoine, clad only in a heavy robe over her nightdress and in slippers, went from her father's bedroom swiftly down into the study again; what she was going to do there she did not definitely know. She heard, as she descended the stairs, the steward in the hall outside the study calling up the police stations of the neighboring villages and giving news of what had happened and instructions to watch the roads; but as she reached the foot of the stairs, a servant closed the study doors. The great, curtained room in its terrifying disorder was brightly lighted, empty, absolutely still. She had given directions that, except for the removal of Blatchford's body, all must be left as it was in the room till the arrival of the police. She stood an instant with hands pressed against her breast, staring down at the spots upon the floor. Was one of them Eaton's?

Something within her told her that it was, and the fierce desire to go to him, to help him, was all she felt just now. It was Donald Avery's and her father's accusation of Eaton that had made her feel like this. She had been feeling, the moment before Donald had spoken, that Philip Eaton had played upon her that evening in making her take him to his confederate in the ravine in order to plan and consummate something here. Above her grief and horror at the killing of her cousin and the danger to her father, had risen the anguish of her guilt with Eaton, the agony of her betrayal. But their accusation that Eaton had killed Wallace Blatchford, seeing him, knowing him—in the light—had swept all that away; all there was of her seemed to have risen in denial of that. Before her eyes, half shut, she saw again the body of her cousin Wallace lying in its blood on the floor, with her father kneeling beside it, his blind eyes raised in helplessness to the light; but she saw now another body too—Eaton's—not here—lying somewhere in the bare, wind-swept woods, shot down by those pursuing him.

She looked at the face of the clock and then down to the pendulum to see whether it had stopped; but the pendulum was swinging. The hands stood at half past one o'clock; now she recalled that, in her first wild gaze about the room when she rushed in with the others, she had seen the hands showing a minute or so short of twenty minutes past one. Not quite a quarter of an hour had passed since the alarm! The pursuit could not have moved far away. She reopened the window through which the pursuers had passed and stepped out onto the dark lawn. A half mile down the beach she heard shouts and a shot; she saw dimly through the night in that direction a boat without lights moving swiftly out upon the lake.

Her hands clenched and pressed against her breast; she stood straining at the sounds of the man-hunt. It had turned west, it seemed; it was coming back her way, but to the west of the house. She crossed the lawn toward the garage. A light suddenly shone out there, and she went on.

The wide door at the car driveway was pushed open, and someone was within working over a car. His back was toward her, and he was bent over the engine, but, at the glance, she knew him and recoiled, gasping. It was Eaton. He turned at the same instant and saw her.

"Oh; it's you!" he cried to her.

Her heart, which almost had ceased to beat, raced her pulses again. At the sound she had made on the driveway, he had turned to her as a hunted thing, cornered, desperate, certain that whoever came must be against him. His cry to her had recognized her as the only one who could come and not be against him; it had hailed her with relief as bringing him help. He could not have cried out so at that instant at sight of her if he had been guilty of what they had accused. Now she saw too, as he faced her, blood flowing over his face; blood soaked a shoulder of his coat, and his left arm dangling at his side; but now, as he threw back his head and straightened in his relief at finding it was she who had surprised him, she saw in him an exultation and excitement she had never seen before—something which her presence alone could not have caused. Tonight, she sensed vaguely, something had happened to him which had changed his attitude toward her and everything else.

"Yes; it's I!" she cried quickly and rushed to him. "It's I! It's I," wildly she reassured him. "You're hurt!" She touched his shoulder. "You're hurt! I knew you were!"

He pushed her back with his right hand and held her away from him. "Did they hurt your father?"

"Hurt Father? No."

"But Mr. Blatchford—"

"Dead," she answered dully.

"They killed him, then!"

"Yes; they—" She iterated. He was telling her now—unnecessarily—that he had had nothing to do with it; it was the others who had done that.

He released her and wiped the blood from his eyes with the heel of his hand. "The poor old man," he said, "—the poor old man!"

"You're Hurt!" She Touched His Shoulder.

She drew toward him in the realization that he could find sympathy for others even in such a time as this.

"Where's the key for the battery and magneto—the key you start the car with?"

She ran to a shelf and brought it to him; he used it and pressed the starting lever. The engine started and he sprang to the seat. His left arm still hanging useless at his side, he tried to throw in the gears with his right hand; but the mechanism of the car was strange to him. She leaped up beside him.

"Move over!" she commanded. "It's this way!"

He slipped to the side and she took the driving seat, threw in the gears expertly, and the car shot from the garage. She switched on the electric headlights as they dashed down the driveway and threw a bright white glare upon the roadway a hundred yards ahead to the gates. Beyond the gates the public pike ran north and south.

"Which way?" she demanded of him, slowing the car.

"Stop!" he cried to her. "Stop and get out! You mustn't do this!"

"You could not pass alone," she said. "Father's men would close the gates upon you."

"The men? There are no men there now—they went to the beach—before! They must have heard something there! It was their being there that turned him—the others back. They tried for the lake and were turned back and got away in a machine; I followed—back up here!"

Harriet Santoine glanced at the face of the man beside her. She could see his features only vaguely; she could see no expression; only the position of his head. But now she knew that she was not helping him to run away; he was no longer hunted—at least he was not only hunted; he was hunting others too. As the car rolled down upon the open gates and he strained forward in the seat beside her, she knew that what he was feeling was a wild eagerness in this pursuit.

"Right or left—quick!" she demanded of him. "I'll take one or the other."

"Right," he shot out. "There are their tracks!" He pointed for her.

"How do you know those are their tracks?" she asked him.

"I told you, I followed them to where they got their machine."

"Who are they?"

"The men who shot Mr. Blatchford."

"Who are they?" she put to him directly again.

He waited, and she knew that he was not going to answer her directly. Suddenly he caught her arm. The road had forked, and he pointed to the left; she swung the car that way, again seeing as they made the turn, the tire-tracks they were following. The car raced up a little hill and now again was descending; the headlights showed a bridge over a ravine.

"Slow! Stop!" her companion commanded.

She raced the car on; he put his hand on the wheel and with his foot tried to push hers from the accelerator; but she fought him; the car swayed and all but ran away as they approached the bridge. "Give it to me!" she screamed to him and wrenched the car about. It was upon the bridge and across it; they they skidded upon the mud of the road again, they could hear the bridge cracking behind.

"Harriet!" he pleaded with her.

She steered the car on, recklessly, her heart thumping with more than the thrill of the chase. "They're the men who tried to kill you, aren't they?" she rejoined. The speed at which they were going did not permit her to look about; she had to keep her eyes on the road at that moment when she knew within herself and was telling the man beside her that she from that moment must be at one with him. For already she had said it; as she risked herself in the pursuit, she thought of the men they were after not chiefly as those who had killed her cousin but as those who had threatened Eaton.

"What do I care what happens to me, if we catch them?" she cried

"Harriet!" he repeated her name again.

"Philip!"

WRITES OF OLD BLIZZARDS

Editor of Independent:

The blizzard of yesterday was the worst seen in this locality for 30 years. We old settlers remember of bad snow storms like the one of January 29, 1909, and the one of March 16, 1902. In that particular storm John Delano, a well known resident of this locality, froze to death in North Dakota, attending to his sheep but not since January 12, 1888 have I seen a blizzard worse than the one of yesterday. It was on Thursday; the weather was very mild and the snow was wet, and the storm came very suddenly, with terrific wind and great fall of temperature. It struck the Dakotas about noon and many school children lost their lives on their way home. Some lost their lives in the west part of this state but the storm arrived too late here to catch anyone at school. In fact most everyone were at their homes, but all live stock outside were driven for miles and then perished. I remember I removed the hides of many of them in the spring when the snow left. Some of our cattle were driven as far as Latimer where they found shelter and were alive when found. There were few groves on the open land and the buildings consisted mostly of straw sheds.

The storm of January 12, 1888 was much colder than the one of yesterday, but much on the same order. They both had plenty of wet snow and wind to work with and they both had a way of packing your clothes with wet snow on the inside as well as on the outside, and for that reason were so hard to resist.

WE'LL TRADE TWO SHARES OF UNITED MFG. STOCK

Livermore Gazette—Humboldt is taking the matter seriously about there being a lake of oil under their town, and one of their citizens has already contracted for the first barrel of oil, agreeing to pay a dollar a gallon for it. They have also organized a "Humbodt Oil and Development Company." Some of our Livermore citizens are inclined to make light of Humboldt's enthusiasm, and others think that Humboldt should be even more enthusiastic than she is over the rosy prospect. Butcher Wilson authorizes us to state officially that he will raise the ante two bits on the man's bid for that first barrel of oil, and St. L. station agent Millett insinuates that Humboldt capitalists are going to hog all the stock and not allow outsiders in, whereas he has some shares of monkey-wrench, or safety-razor stock, or some such thing that he is anxious to trade in for a slice of that oil stock.

AGITATE PARK ROAD TO PILOT KNOB PARK

The Forest City "Summit" last week carried an article agitating a decent wagon and auto road along the county line to Pilot Knob park. It says that a good road means nothing at all "in the young lives of the members of the board of Supervisors of Hancock county. The Summit inquires why a couple of days could not be taken this spring and such a road fixed by donated labor on the part of business men and citizens of Forest City. Pilot Knob is quite a sight, but until a decent road is arranged to it, sightseers are apt to be few and hardy.

DEMONSTRATION AT ALDRICH FARM

A poultry and orchard demonstration was held at the R. E. Lee Aldrich farm south of town on Monday forenoon. Mr. Johnson, of the State College at Ames, spoke on orchards and S. W. Henn, of the college, on poultry. A good sized crowd was in attendance and pronouced it a fine meeting.

DISTRICT COURT ITEMS

Monitor—Judge Thompson of Webster City opened the April term of the district court on Monday. It is probable that a large amount of business will be transacted as it is the last term until fall.

The grand jury organized by electing the first named as foreman: T. Shillington, Richard Rompf, Ben Suiter, J. E. Richardson, A. C. Reitz Martin Olson, George Elder. Their session will be short unless some new cases come to light. Bootleggers constitute the main business.

Two cases have been assigned for next week, as follows: Andrew Jorgenson vs. Lewis Moe; Arthur W. Hanson vs. George Aldrich.

Leo Prince, who is confined in the county jail, was allowed to go home to Belmond last week to attend the funeral of his new born babe. Deputy Johnson accompanied him.

F. A. Peterson of Dows, who was taken to Cherokee a short time ago, passed away at that instituion Sunday night. He was an old time resident of his home locality where he will be buried Wednesday.

A marriage license was granted to Raymond Sebby of Eagle Grove and Marry Bell of Clarion.

Howard Hutchinson was brought before Judge Thompson Tuesday, charged with the theft of a sum of money. The court sentenced him to the reform school at Eldora, suspending sentence during good behavior. The lad was paroled to Attorney Hill, to whom he must make regular reports of his conduct. This case should be a good object lesson to other fathers and mothers, who allow their children too much freedom.

The supreme court has sustained the ten months jail sentence recently meted out to Herbert Bige for his part in the Woolstock-Goldfield robberies a couple of years since.

Ted Crawford, a more or less undesirable citizen of Clarion, is serving thirty days in the county jail at the request of Mayor McCreery.

The Worrick-Kellogg juvenile case from Clarion has been continued a day. A stiff dose of judicial advice should be administrated in this case if one would comply with public sentiment.

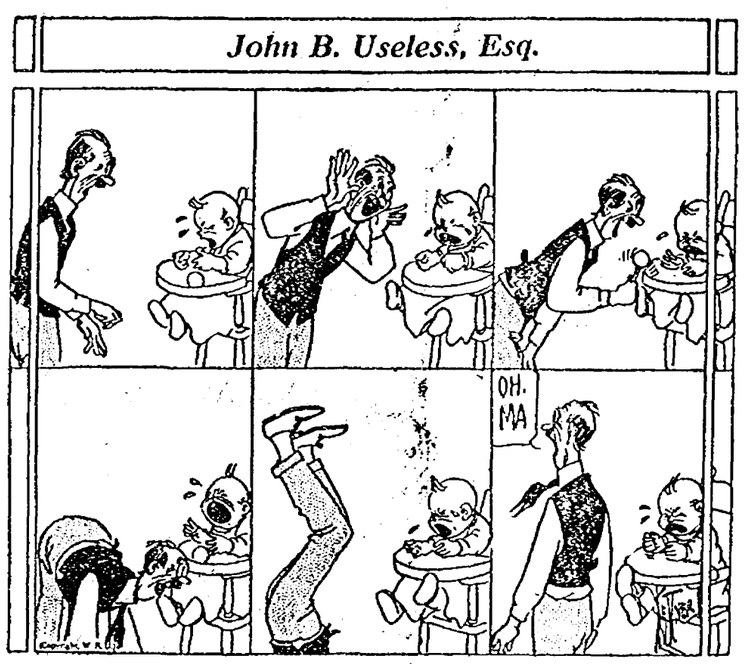
Through an error this paper last week stated that supervisors Mehl and Evans were opposed to the graveling of the east and west mile of primary road No. 10 near Clarion. At Tuesday's board session the entire matter was corrected and all five of the supervisors voted to go thru with the proposition as soon as possible. Mr Mehl further states that he has always favored this improvement. We also got the "saddle on the wrong horse in speaking of the Wilson highway and No 60 south of Eagle Grove. The former is to be graveled and the latter graded and drained.

STEAL SILKS AT VENTURA

Unknown thieves broke into the C. E. Kluver store at Ventura recently, and stole all the silk goods they could carry away. Goods to the amount of $300 were taken. Entrance was gained thru the front door, which was pried open. After gathering up the silks, the robbers twisted the handle of the safe door open, filled the crevice up with explosive, and blew open the safe. There was no money in the safe, however, and the thieves then made their getaway in a car. No trace has been found of them.

LATIMER WOMAN SUICIDES

Mrs. Jeffrey Pearse of Latimer took her own life last week by swallowing strychnine, which she had purchased at a drug store, giving as the reason for the purchase the excuse that she wanted to poison some rats. She was 55 years of age, and the only reason known for her act is grief for a son, who died in 1915, which it is thought affected her mind. She had been in good health.



Much New Building Now In Progress

A Number Of New Buildings Now Being Constructed Indicate Good Year Here.

MANY IMPROVEMENTS TOO

Spring opens in Belmond with a considerable amount of new building and improvements started or in prospect. From present indications, this year will witness a greater amount of building and improving than for some years past.

Among the building operations now going no, are those of the Belmond Auto Co. who have started pouring the concrete on their new addition, where the Lathrop produce house formerly stood. C. Schmelz has begun the erection of his new fireproof building on the corner opposite the Belmond Auto Co., the concrete work being started. Fitts and Hanson have started the construction of a concrete block building on their lot next the Jacobson store, which will be occupied by the Swift Produce Co., with John Zook as manager. A. W. Hill is constructing a temporary building on his lot where his garage stood, and later contemplates extending the building to the front line of the lot. E. H. Sands is progressing nicely in the erection of his new building. W. H. Wolle expects to rebuild his office destroyed in the fire, and C. N. Reese has under consideration a new building on his lots, formerly occupied by the Townsan Hardware. L. M. Simerson may rebuild his property destroyed in the fire, this summer. There are rumors of other buildings this summer, including dwelling, while a considerable amount of improvement is being and will be made. The pendalum seems to have started again on the upward swing, and Belmond by mid-summer should present a big improvement.

HUMBOLDT TO STAGE BIG 4TH OF JULY AFFAIR

Humboldt has taken the start in the field and announces that the grand and glorious Fourth will be properly observed at that city this year. The Commercial Club, American Legion and the Humboldt Farm Bureau are all co-operating in the celebration, and plans are being made to make it a big time. The American Legion will dedicate their new memorial building on that date as part of the festivities. Arrangements are already being made for band, speakers, etc.

GARNER THINKS MAYBE LOWER RATES COMING

The Garner Leader in an article last week tells of a visit and address made there by John Reed, of the Iowa Falls Electric Co., and declares that there is an expectation of securing lower juice rates as a result. Mr. Reed addressed the Commercial Club of Garner on the rate question, there having been some agitation for lower rates which brought Mr. Reed there. The Klemme Times also states that as a result of a visit there by Mr. Reed, they are anticipating lower rates.

Hold Sunday School Convent on Sunday

Immanuel Church East of Town to Be Scene of Wright County Convention.

AFTERNOON AND EVENING

The Belmond District of the Wright County Sunday School association meets at the Immanuel Reformed church Sunday afternoon and evening. The various churches have made arrangements for transportation, so that no one will remain home on that account. The following program has been arranged:

Afternoon meeting at 2:30 Rev. Leinbach: "Echoes of the International Conference." Rev. J. F. Jamison: "The Spiritual Life of the Teacher."

Evening meeting at 7:30. H. F. Luick: "The Need of A Teachers' Training Class in Every School." Rev. J. M. Jensen: "The Aim of the Sunday School Teacher."

The choir of the Immanuel church will furnish the music, accompanied by piano and pipe organ. The gravel is in fine shape really tempting. Try it out and stop over at the church both afternoon and evening.

A. W. Waalkes, Dist. Pres.

MESERVEY AGAIN AFTER NEW SCHOOL BUILDING

The much "cussed and discussed" question of a new school building for Meservey is again bobbing up. The board of directors recently sent out a questionaire asking the patrons of the school what their desires were in the matter; whether they wanted to build a new building which would bring the school district $750 a year in state aid, or make the present building do a while longer and let the state aid go. Some of the Meservey high school graduates are attending other schools, at the cost of the school district, which must pay their tuition. Senument in and about Meservey is strongly divided; the people are either outspokenly for or flatly against, a new school building. Previous elections have resulted in the defeat of the project.

HAMPTON WILL HAVE FINE COUNTRY CLUB

A number of Hamptonites who are badly afflicted with the golf bug, got together last week and organized a Country Club. Ground has been secured on the W. L. Robinson farm two miles north of Hampton, where a nine-hole golf course will be laid out at once. A modest club house will erected for the present, altho a more pretensious structure is anticipated later on. Much enthusiasm is being displayed by the Hampton golfites, particularly among business and professional men of the city.

An alarm of fire last week brought the fire company to W. T. Gfeller's garage, where his car was blazing merrily. The blaze had been pretty well extinguished before the company arrived. Damage was negligible.

EAGLE GROVE RAISES $1,500 FOR BASE BALL TEAM

The business men and sportsmen of Eagle Grove are determined to have the best base ball team in this neck of the woods this summer, and to that end have raised a purse of $1,500 to finance such a team. It is expected that even more will be raised. Wilson, the star heaver of that country, will be their main star in the box, and only one man, a catcher to hold the pitcher, is to be hired. Much enthusiasm is being shown.

EAGLE GROVE DOWNS THE SUNDAY MOVIES HARD

The election held at Eagle Grove, Saturday over the question of Sunday movies, was defeated by an overwhelming vote. The total vote was around 1,500, and the question was downed by a 2 to 1 vote of the Eagle Grove citizens. The ministers preached against it Sunday, and a monster parade of the Sunday school children, led by the Boy Scouts, was staged to arouse interest and bring out the voters. The cost of the election was stood by the manager of the Princess theatre of Eagle Grove. This will probably decide for good the question of Sunday movies, which has been brewing there for the past year or more.

KLEMME IMPROVING STREETS

The new city administration at Klemme is starting out with a vim to improve the town and live up to what is expected of them. The city last week purchased a Fordson tractor to be used in grading and dragging the streets, as the first step. The fire department of the town is after more equipment and better facilities for fire fighting, and the council is expected to purchase this. A chemical truck similar to Belmond's is under consideration.

Grim Reaper Claims Three More Here

Ida Blond Tyrrell and Mrs. H. D Reese, Well Known Citizens, Die Last Week.

INFANT CHILD DIES FRI.

IDA BLOND TYRRELL

Ida Blond Tyrrell was born at Oxford Junction, Iowa, January 4, 1883, and died in the hospital at Mason City, April 13, 1923, aged 40 years, three months and nine days.

Miss Tyrrell received her education at the Oxford Junction schools, after which she taught for eight years. She professed faith in Christ, and united with the Free Will Baptist church when she was 18 years old, and held her membership in that church until she moved to Belmond with her parents, about 11 years ago. She then placed her membership in the Congregational church. This was her church until her membership was transfered to the church above. Miss Tyrrell was ever ready to do what she could in the work of the church, and was president of the Ladies Aid Society for two years. She was also a member of the Rebekah lodge and was active in all its work.

Five or six months ago Miss Tyrrell felt an affliction coming on, which gradually grew worse, altho all that medical knowledge and surgical skill could do, was done, until at five o'clock Saturday morning death relieved her from the suffering of the body.

Miss Tyrrell had been in the millinery business here for the past eight years. During her life here she made many friends by her jolly ways and cheerful disposition. Funeral services were held Sunday, at the Congregational church, with the pastor, Rev. Leinbach in charge, assisted by Rev. Waalkes. The Rebekah lodge had charge of the services at the grave. Interment was made in Franklin Grove cemetery.

Those from out of town who attended the funeral services were:

Dr. Melburn Brink and wife from Boyden, Ia., Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Tyrrell of Sioux Rapids, Jas. DuBois and wife of Oxford Junction, Clifford Field of Cedar Rapids, Mrs. Philgraf from Spencer, Mr. ward Kent and wife of Olin, and Mrs. Ed Ballous of Rowan.

MRS. H. D. REESE

Mrs. H. D. Reese was born in Warran county, Ohio, July 16, 1855, and died at her home southwest of Belmond on Friday, April 13, 1923. She was married at Sandwich, DeKalb county Illinois, on January 4, 1880, to Homer D. Reese, who preceded her a year ago. Five children were born to them: Charles, of Fort Dodge; Gertrude, of St. Cloud, Minn. Lida, of Hickory Grove, Iowa; Harry who was with his mother until the time of her death; and Mary Frances deceased. Besides her children, she leaves to mourn her loss three brothers and one sister, one sister-in-law, Sarah A. Reese, and a host of friends and neighbors. Mrs. Reese was a very friendly woman, and thought a great deal of her neighbors, who returned the affection. Funeral services were held Monday afternoon at the Methodist church in Belmond, Rev. Wilkinson in charge, and interment was made in Franklin Grove cemetery.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks to the friends and neighbors for their kindness and sympathy during the death of our beloved mother and sister, and to the friends and relatives who brought flowers.

EDITORIAL

IT'S NOT YOUR NATIONALITY

A few years back there was a popular song, "It's Not Your Nationality, It's Simply YOU." There is a lot of truth in that. It's not nationality, or creed, or politics, or ancestors, it's what are you? Because a man was born in the old country does not signify that he is none the less a man. Because a man believes in one creed and you in another does not hinder him from being a gentleman. Because a man had an ancestor who was hung for stealing horses is no sign that the man is a horse thief. Or if his ancestors were blue-blooded and occupied the places of the mighty is no sign that he, himself because of those back numbers, is entitled to any more respect or admiration than Bill Brown, the street sweeper. It's not what your folks were—it's what are you?

There are some people who dote on blue blood; unless your ancestors came over in the Mayflower and were descended from the chief of the Ape tribe, you are a distant spot on the horizon—if, indeed, you can be seen at all. How they figure it is beyond us. What difference whether your great-great-great great-grand aunt's cousins' sisters' were ladies in waiting to the Duke Whoosus at the court of King Kutemup, that cuts no ice with you. If you behave yourself, attended to your own business and live a decent life, you're as good as the next fellow; and if you're a scalawag your ancestors won't make you anything else. It's not what they were, but what you ARE. Maybe your grand father was a pirate or a highway robber; it doesn't go to show that you are, or that because of him you are going to be.

Give a person credit for what they are, good, bad or indifferent. If a person has hit the high spots, but has seen the error of the way, then give him credit for what he is, not for what he was. What he may have been is nothing compared to what he is, particularly if he has demonstrated that he means to stick. If you have a million, the fact doesn't alter your character—how did you get it? If you haven't a dime, you still can be as much a gentleman as the man with the million. Or the fact that a man has a million doesn't mean he can't be a gentleman.

"It's Not Your Nationality, It's Simply You!" is a song that ought to be sung more often.

PHYSICAL TRAINING

The Iowa general assembly has passed a bill requiring compulsory physical training and health instruction in all schools, elemetary and secondary, after July 1, 1923, in each grade to the extent of 50 minutes a week. When Gov. Kendall signs it, it becomes a law. The Independent believes this is a wise law. Physical training for all is something which the American schools have long needed. Athletics benefits the few rather than the many, and by that statement do not infer that this paper is against athletics—far from it! But giving each student training, it must be conceeded, is better than giving it to a few. Athletics should continue; they are a mighty good thing for any school in more ways than one. Our schools have too long concentrated upon drilling the mind, to the detriment of the body. A strong body means a better equipped mind. All the education in the world will do no good unless there is the health to utilize and enjoy it. If it were a choice between education and health which would you take? As the Independent understands the new law, a manual of training will be outlined by the state school department for each grade, so that the proper training will be given according to age. With the American youth receiving proper physical attention from the start, America can expect a better, stronger race in the coming generation.

ANNOUNCEMENT

of Interest to

MILLIONS OF FAMILIES

"I will build a car for the multitude"

Said Henry Ford in 1903----Read how the fulfillment of that prophecy is now made possible through the

Ford Weekly Purchase Plan

For many years it has been Henry Ford's personal ambition to make the Ford the universal family car---to put it within the reach of the millions of people who have never been privileged to enjoy the benefits of motor car ownership.

During the past fifteen years over 7,500,000 Ford cars have been placed in the hands of retail customers---more than a million and a half of them within the past twelve months---and yet there are still millions of families who are hopefully looking forward to the day when they can own a Ford.

And now the way is open.

Under the terms of this plan you can select your Ford Car, set aside a small amount each week and you will be surprised how soon you will own it. In the meantime your money will be safely deposited to your credit in one of the local banks where it will draw interest.

Think it over. Five dollars will start an account. The whole family can participate in it---father, mother, brothers and sisters each doing a little.

Why not start today. Step in and talk it over with your local Ford dealer. He will be glad to fully explain the details of the plan and help you get started toward the ownership of a Ford car.

Poultry Association Meets.

A meeting of the Wright county Poultry asociation was held at the county agent's office Thursday afternoon and about twenty poultry breeders from various parts of the county were in attendance. This meeting was called for the purpose of making plans for the Wright County Poultry show, which will be held sometime next fall.

President A. R. Thorpe of Clarion was authorized to appoint a committee to plan and organize the show for next fall. Secretary E. R. Ballou was instructed to get in touch with the directors of the various towns of the county and determine which town of Wright county would offer the best accommodations and most attractive premiums for the Wright county show next fall.

The Wright County Poultry association is back of the boys and girls poultry club of the county as is evidenced by the special prizes to the youngsters who become members of the poultry club, which is carried on in connection with the county agent activities. A number of the breeders have agreed to furnish a setting of eggs, free of charge, to the first boy or girl who applies, the only requirement being that the birds be shown at the Wright County Poultry show next fall. Those in atendence at the meeting were as follows: President A .R. Thorpe,Secretary E. R. Ballou, Clarence McBride, C. A. Dahlgren, Harry Tague, W. H. Bray, Geo. Turk, J. G. Freese, O. J. Peterson, Earl D. Mickelson, Mrs. C. McBride, Mrs E. E. Wolf, Mrs. E. R. Ballou, Mrs. H. E. Rogers.

Poultry Specialist Coming.

Prof. L. E. Heifner, of the poultry department of the extension service at Ames will be in Wright county April 19th and 20th to assist the county agent in the organization work in connection with the Wright County Poultry show.

Mr. Heifner, in cooperation with the county agent, will make definite plans for conducting the poultry club work for the 1923 season. The membership in the poultry club has grown to such an extent that it has been felt that a definite schedule of work should be outlined in order to make the work most effective for the youngsters. With the assistance of Mr. Heifner, who is an authority on poultry club activities, the county agent hopes to arrange a very definite program of work for the 1923 poultry club season.

Seed Corn Survey.

A complete survey of the seed corn stituation of Wright county is being made by the county agent with the view of determining the germinating qualities of the seed corn of our county.

Word has been received from the extension department at Ames that a number of counties have seed corn which is affected by the dry rot mold and other diseases which affect the germinating qualities of the seed. Since corn is the "money crop" of Wright county, it has been deemed advisable to make a survey of the county to determine what per cent of the corn of Wright county will germinate and produce good vigorous stalks of corn.

The general plan which will be followed in making this seed corn survey of Wright county will be as follows: About ten to fifteen samples of corn from the same number of farmers in each township representing 100 ears from each farm, will be collected by the county agent and a germination test will be run of these samples from each of the sixteen townships of the county. By making a germination test of these samples of corn from each township, it will be possible to arrive at a reasonably accurate estimate of the seed corn situation in Wright county.

Corn Yield Experiment Plots

The corn yield experiment which were conducted during the 1922 growing season and the results which are familiar to most Wright county farmers will be conducted again this year. Samples of corn are being collected for this experimental work and will be grown in different sections of the county.

The general plan of carrying on this experimental work will be the same as last year, that is, about eight or ten samples of seed corn consisting of ten ears each will be collected from each township in the county and each of these ten ear samples will be planted in one of four experiment plots located in different parts of the county where soil conditions vary to some extent. The object of the experiment will be to determine the variety of corn which is best adapted to this section of our sate and to show incidentally, the variety which yields the highest, all conditions being equal. Each sample which is contributed will be planted in four rows by itself and a check plot of four rows will be left between this and the next sample which is planted in the same field, thus allowing no chance for a mixing of the samples which are planted nearby one another.

Keen interest seems to have developed in connection with this corn yield experiment and a number of samples have already been received at the county agent's office to be used in this experiment. A small registration fee of 25 cents is being charged each farmer who enters the contest, this money to be used as an entrance fee in the 1924 state yield test for the winner of the Wright county contest. Those who are interested in taking part in this county corn yield experiment should either bring or send a ten ear sample of their best seed to the county agent's office not later than May first.

Soy Bean Experiment Plots.

The county agent has arranged to conduct a series of experiments this year on the use of soy beans on our Wright county farms. The object of these experiments will be to determine the value of soy beans as a general crop; determine the varieties of soy beans best adapted to our county conditions and to distribute seed from the most profitable varieties.

These experiments will be conducted in cooperation with the Farm Crops Section of the Extension Service at Ames, and specialists from that department will assist the county agent in carrying on his work. Three pounds of seed of each of ten standard varieties of soy beans have been secured from the Extension Departmetn and will be used in as many experiment plots. The beans will be planted in corn leaving four rows of corn without beans between different plots so as to keep the varieties separated. The experiment will be used to determine the merits of soy beans for both silage and hogging down purposes.

The use of soy beans in Wright county is more or less in an experimental stage and it is hoped that by conducting experiments of this kind, the value of the soy bean on our Wright county farms will be definitely determined. A great many of our farmers have grown the soy bean during the past two years but there seems to be nothing very definite as to which variety gives best results under our soil and climatic conditions. A great deal is claimed for the soy bean as a soil builder and as a feed which is very high in protein and if ths crop is to be grown extensively in our county, we should have the facts concerning its growth under our local conditions.

BURNING—IN STAND

Our repair shop is equiped with a Miles type "F" Combination Ford and Fordson Burning and Running in machine. This machine is identical in principle and construction with the machines used to burn in bearings and to test out motors in the Ford Motor Co's plant at Detroit.

To those who are unfamiliar with the machanical construction of the automobile motor we offer the following explanation of the purpose this machine serves—

All the crankshaft bearings of the internal combustion engine are faced with a special metal known as high speed babit. This metal meets and turn against the harder metal of the crankshaft and when properly installed and well lubricated is practically free from wear for the life of the motor.

The proper installation of new bearings and crankshaft is, nowever, a job requiring extreme mechanical exactness, since the new bearing must be adjusted and shaped to fit the shaft. If the fit is not exact the "play" resulting will, when the motor is in service, create a "knock"or "pound" which will wear away the soft babit metal and render the repair worthless.

The function of the burning in stand is to make it possible for the mechanic to fit the bearings perfectly by the process of "burning in". That is to say, he can wear the bearings to fit the shaft, by placing the motor with its new bearings installed in the stand and running it at various speeds. While doing so he makes the necessary adjustments by tightening the bolts holding the bearings in place until such parts are worn smooth and fit exactly all over.

The machine can also be used to test out motors, since, by placing the motor in the stand before it is worked upon, defects, in the bearing or crankshaft parts become readily apparent. We therefore use the burning in stand for a two fold purpose. First, to find trouble in the motor bearings and second, to insure accurate workmanship in turning out repair jobs.

Planter Profits!

Your soil may be rich, your seed bed in A-1 shape, the weather favorable and your seed of the very best, yet you are likely to have a poor stand unless your planter puts every hill in its place and makes every hill a full hill. Before you can get planter profits you must have a planter you can absolutely depend on. The International No. 8 is such a planter. It is designed and built with just one end in view—to drop accurately and to check evenly—to place every hill where it belongs and to make every hill a full one. Accuracy—that's it—and it spells planter profits for you. Buy and use an International No. 8 Corn Planter this year. We sell 'em.

A CORRECTION

The correspondent who writes the Meservey News for the Independent, misrepresented things just a little last week when it was stated that "Mrs. Mel Smith and baby of Mason City visited relatives and friends in town several days last week." The facts are that the over-night call at the home of Mr. and Mrs M. A. Smith was not a visit alone, but mostly a business transaction. And as the parties were divorced over a year ago, and the same is a matter of record in Mason City objection comes from both parties as to the above use of the name in the item, which should have read, "Mrs. Carolyn B. Red Crown

The High-Grade Gasoline

Better Than Ever

There is an erroneous idea abroad. You hear it every day. "Gasoline is not as good as it used to be." The fact is that the Red Crown Gasoline you are getting today is an almost perfect fuel.

Perhaps there is no industry where progress has made such rapid strides as the refining of petroleum.

For example, we cite the Burton Process, developed and perfected in the laboratories of the Standard Oil Company (Indiana). The Burton Process has enabled the refiner to bring gasoline to a point of efficiency hitherto unhoped for.

Red Crown Is Made by the Burton Process

Red Crown vaporizes to the last drop. There is no waste—it produces instant starting Winter or Summer — a quick get-away — a smooth running engine—tremendous sustained pulling power and racing speed if you want it.

LEGISLATORS NOW ALL IN A RUSH

(By G. L. Caswell)
Des Moines April 12, 1923.

The last days of the long legislative grind are now at hand. Sifting committees have all the bills for acts that have been offered and not acted upon in both houses. Something like 600 of these bills were turned over to the two committees, and it is up to them to determine which ones are important and pressing and which ones shall go to the waste basket—and no questions asked.

But questions are asked. No sifting committee is without feeling or respect for the members who have introduced bills. The members of the committees are known and are always approachable. They are acting with grim determination to bring everything they can to a focus for final action, and to hide away what does not have to be acted upon. It is no criticism to say that half the bills offered in this session are needless and valueless from a statewide standpoint. In every session it is the same. Men elected as representatives of their districts are often pressed and urged to introduce measures they do not think much of. They also have some personal business or other experiences that make them think certain bills for acts ought to be introduced. After introducing them they find others do not regard them as important, and compared with other pending legislation they are not important. Such bills can go to the waste basket without bad results.

There are, however in this session more members who are trying to legislate for their own townships and towns than we ever saw in any general assembly. Members whose vision is not statewide, but countywide, or less. They often measure everything by their little six-mile yardstick and the effect that legislation will have on their own pocketbooks or business. Fortunately such members do not get far, but numerous enough in any session, they might make statewide interests suffer.

All Over Next Tuesday.

The last day of the session will be next week Tuesday the 17th. That day will be one of hurry and turmoil with relaxation and recklessness on the part of those who never expect to come back again, or whose measures have been killed or otherwise cared for.

Now the appropriation bills carrying millions, and meaning more than anything else during the session are getting their trimming. State prisons asylums, reformatories state colleges and educational intitutions, state aid for this and that, and finally the "omnibus bill" carrying the salaries and maintenance items for state officials generally are under consideration, with a careful calculation on the millage tax that will have to be spread over the state to take care of it all. Some who have tried to put on the brakes during the session predict that the millage tax for state purposes will be higher than it was last year, or ever before—perhaps three mills higher. The soldiers' bonus, the new medical hospital at Iowa City, the increase in college and state institution attendance, the growing salaries and all require more money in these days of high prices and profiteering.

The House gave its approval of the proposed appropriation of $450,000 a year for five years to match the Rockefeller foundation gift for the great medical school and hospital at Iowa City, and passed the Senate bill without amendment. The money to start this great state medical departmen of research and ministration to the sick and unfortunate will be immediately available when the act just passed becomes a law.

Not Tight on Appropriations.

Everything carrying an appropriation is contested. But the maternity and infancy bill carrying $21,000 for Iowa City was passed, and the state fair board get the $65,000 they asked for to build additional barn room for sheep and baby beef at the fair. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars was voted to rebuild the armory burned down at Ames college and the appropriation of $250,000 a year for eradication of animal tuberculosis was continued with the added efficiency of a law permitting counties to establish county areas for eradicating bovine tuberculosis. Petition of 51 per cent of the voters of a county will require a board of supervisors to submit the question at a special election as to whether the county shall levy a tax of three mills to help pay for cattle destroyed because of tuberculosis.

The House last Thursday then passed a bill appropriating $50,000 to aid private and denominational colleges in this state in the training of teachers for the public schools. Scattered all over the state no school will get much of this, but enough to permit each one to hire a special supervisor of moral training to head a teachers' training department. It is regarded as a good solution of the teachers shortage problem. Representative Story of Clarke county sponsored the bill and put it over.

Now come the big appropriation bills carrying over $35,000,000 which must be acted upon during the next few days to permit all the state institutions to continue to function. Both the great state colleges are asking for a million more than heretofore, in order to keep up with their increased attendance.

Gas Tax Bill Passed House.

Contrary to predictions, the Caldwell-Meade bill to levy a tax of two cents per gallon on all gasoline sold at retail in Iowa passed the House Wednesday by a close vote, but as amended it is neither pleasing to its sponsors nor to the Senate which originated the act. The Senate bill provided that the five million dollars to be raised by this tax should be divided equally between the primary and secondary or county roads in each county according to area, while the House amendments take it all for the secondary roads and leave the primary roads to get along with the curtailed funds they will have left when the Tuck law and other trimmings are deducted. Legislators from city districts pointed out that as most of the tax will be paid by autoes owned in the towns, they have a right to a good part of the money on the primary roads which they travel. Secondary road advocates, however, declared most primary roads are now finished, especially in northern Iowa, and they want the secondary roads brought up to grade and graveled. The Senate bill as passed provided that boards of supervisors "may" do away with the two mill road fund levy; the House bill as passed makes this mandatory and also permits cancellation of the dragging fund two mill levy. House members will never agree to a gasoline tax measure that does not retire some regular tax levy, they say.

However, the gasoline tax bill is not expected to pass the Senate with the House amendments, which means that a conference committee of members from both houses will be named to thresh the matter out and compromise the difference. Most members interviewed by your correspondent do not believe they can compromise the matter acceptably, and say that no gasoline tax law will come from this general assembly. There has been more selfishness, greed, unfairness and bad statesmanship used in connection with this gas tax proposition than any other one thing before this general assembly. Gasoline selling concerns are all fighting against such a law here while spending more than the amount involved in new oil stations that are not needed half as much as the good roads are needed.

Stop Lottery Prizes.

A bill that will effectively stop commercial lotteries as they have been operated all over this state recently, passed the House Monday. It it becomes a law it will confiscate the prizes offered in lottery schemes.

The Bowman bill to reduce the property assessment along paved roads from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent passed the Senate, with a proviso that those who have recently been assessed 25 per cent shall have half of that amount refunded to them, and that the amount of 12½ per cent in the future shall be expended on roads leading to the paved roads along lands that are assessed within the mile and a half limit.

Many minor bills are now passing both houses rapidly—too rapidly for any newspaper report in detail. The big things still pending are the taxation bills proposed by the special taxation committee and the Ways and Means committees, the several automobile license bills, the numerous highway bills and the appropriation bills.

Thursday the Senate killed the Ruser bill limiting the state highway commission to an expenditure of $200,000 a year, and also killed the bill of Representative Patterson which provided that where elections have been held favoring paving, the same counties can vote again to stop such paving. This indicates that no removal of the highway commission to Des Moines or any other legislation very damaging to the commission or good roads program will get by at this session.

County Officers Salaries.

A good, lengthy contest developed in the Senate Thursday over the bill to make county officers' salaries the same for the next two years as they have been in the past. The bill was finally passed. The Edson House bill providing for storage of grain on the farm and issuing of credit for loans on same was passed by the Senate, making it possible hereafter for farmers to hold their grain and at the same time use the money it is worth if needed.

Ku Klux Klanners were recognized in Iowa for the first time when the House bill passed the Senate, making it a crime to wear a mask or disguise when entering any house or demanding admission to any house or for the purpose of committing crime of any kind. It was the anti-Klux bill and was sponsored by Senator White of Benton county who mercilessly invoked the rule requiring every senator for vote. Only two votes lined up against the bill—Price of Monroe and Brookhart of Washington.

Senator Slosson's bill passed which will stop dealers in automobiles from using their dealers license numbers on private cars or for anything but cars shown for sale.

The railway long and short haul bill passed by both houses and vetoed last week by the governor, is to be fixed up to eliminate the discrimination features objected to and will likely yet pass and become a law.

Sifting Committee Named.

Lieutenant-Gov. Hammill named the Senate sifting committee Wednesday afternoon. Senator Perkins of Sac county is chairman of this committee, and the other members are: White of Benton, Hale of Jones, Campbell of Ida, Baird of Pottawattamie, Shane of Wapello and Bergman of Jasper.

William Schmedika of Hardin county was sworn in as senator from the Hamilton, Hardin, Wright, district Thursday, taking the place of D. C. Chase of Webster City, whose death occured in March. Schmedika makes the fourth Democrat now in the Senate and represents largely the protest of Hardin county over the combination of Wright and Hamilton politicans who have kept Hardin county without a senator for 22 years.

Having heard U S. Senator Brookhart early in the session, both houses of this general assembly have now invited Senator Cummins to address them in joint session. Thus politics enters even in the busiest days, and business waits. But—business wishes the session were ended thirty days ago.

The BLIND MAN'S EYES

BY

WILLIAM MacHARG and EDWIN BALMER

COPYRIGHT BY LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held. Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him.

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by snowdrifts.

CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santoine, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt.

CHAPTER VII.—Circumstances point to Eaton as Santoine's assailant.

CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on Warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Harriet Santoine to withhold judgment, telling her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers sufficiently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier requires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the position of a semi-prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.—Eaton meets a resident of the house, Wallace Blatchford, and a young girl, Mildred Davis, with whom apparently he is acquainted, though they conceal the fact. Eaton's mission is to secure certain documents which are vital to his interests, and his being admitted to the house is a remarkable stroke of luck. The girl agrees to aid him. He becomes deeply interested in Harriet Santoine, and she in him.

CHAPTER XII.—Harriet tells Eaton she and Donald Avery act as "eyes" to Santoine, reading to him the documents on which he bases his judgments. While walking with her, two men in an automobile deliberately attempt to run Eaton down. He escapes with slight injuries. The girl recognizes one of the men as having been on the train on which they came from Seattle.

CHAPTER XIII.—Santoine questions Eaton closely, but the latter is reticent. The blind man tells him he is convinced the attack made on him on the train was the result of an error, the attacker having planned to kill Eaton. Santoine tells Harriet she is to take charge of certain papers connected with the "Latron properties," which had hitherto been in Avery's charge.

CHAPTER XIV.—Avery seeks to influence Harriet, as his wife to be, to give the papers to him. She refuses. Harriet is beginning to feel that her love belongs to Eaton.

CHAPTER XV.—At the country club Eaton reveals a remarkable proficiency at polo, seemingly to Avery's gratification. Eaton induces Harriet to allow him to leave the grounds for a few minutes that night.

CHAPTER XVI.—That night Eaton invades Santoine's library, seeking the papers he is determined to possess. There he finds two men, one of whom he recognizes with bewildered surprise, on the same errand. The three men engage in a pistol duel.

CHAPTER XVII.—Aroused by the shooting, Santoine descends to the library. The combatants are there, but silent. Wallace Blatchford arrives and is on the point of informing Santoine of the identity of one of the intruders when he is shot and instantly killed. The fighters escape. The safe has been rifled and important papers taken.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Harriet finds Eaton, badly wounded. She helps him and accompanies him in an auto in pursuit of the invaders of the house. He satisfies her of his innocence, which she has never doubted. Avery and a hastily summoned posse pursue Eaton. Satisfied he has wounded the man he recognized in Santoine's study, Eaton leaves Harriet and takes up the trail through the woods.

CHAPTER XIX.—Harriet reveals her actions to her father. She is confident he has a clue to the mystery.

CHAPTER XX.—Peculiar happenings in the stock market apparently convince Santoine of the truth of a theory he has formed.

CHAPTER XXI.—Eaton tracks the man he has shot, through the woods, and ascertains that he has been carried away in a boat.

CHAPTER XXII.—Harriet makes the discovery, through Avery, that "Eaton" is really Hugh Overton, convicted of the murder of Matthew Latron, and a fugitive from justice. Overton is captured.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Santoine confronts Avery with proof of double dealing. Avery confesses that Latron was not murdered, as claimed, but in fear of prosecution for offenses against federal statutes had disappeared, another man's body being substituted for his, and Overton charged with his murder. It was Latron who had been in the study the night before, and whose dead body was spirited away.

CHAPTER XXIV.—Hugh Overton had all along believed that Santoine had been a party to the conspiracy which had branded him as a murderer, and that Harriet, acting as one of the blind man's "eyes," must also have had knowledge of the facts. Avery's confession that he had all along misled Santoine dispels that belief, also establishing Overton's innocence of crime.

"We must go back to the quite serious emergency to which I am indebted for your faithful service. Five years ago the American people appeared perfectly convinced that the only way to win true happiness and perpetuate prosperity was to accuse, condemn and jail for life—if execution were not legal—the heads of the important groups of industrial properties. Just at that time, one of these men—one of the most efficient but also, perhaps, the one personally most obnoxious or unpopular—committed one of his gravest indiscretions. It concerned the private use of deposits in national banks; it was a federal offense of the most patent and provable kind. He was indicted. Considering the temper of any possible jury at that time, there was absolutely no alternative but to believe the man under indictment must spend many succeeding years, if not the rest of his life, in the federal penitentiary at Atlanta or Leavenworth.

"Now, the man was in complete control of a group of the most valuable and prosperous properties in America. Before his gaining control, the properties had been almost ruined by differences between the minor men who tried to run them; only the calling of Matthew Latron into control saved those men from themselves; they required him to govern them; his taking away would bring chaos and ruin among them again. They knew that. Just before he must go to trial, Latron himself became convinced that he faced confinement for the rest of his life; then fate effectively intervened to end all his troubles. His body, charred and almost consumed by flames—but nevertheless the identified body of Matthew Latron—was found in the smoking ruins of his shooting lodge, which burned to the ground two days before his trial."

Avery was hunched in the seat watching the blind man with growing conviction and fear.

Santoine went on: "A young man was shown to have followed Latron to the shooting lodge; a witness appeared who had seen this young man shoot Latron; a second witness had seen him set fire to the lodge. The young man—Hugh Overton—was put on trial for his life. I, myself, as a witness at the trial supplied the motive for the crime; for, though I had never met Overton, I knew that he had lost the whole of a large fortune through investments recommended to him by Latron. Overton was convicted, sentenced to death; he escaped before the sentence was carried out—became a fugitive without a name, who if he ever appeared would be handed over for execution. For the evidence had been perfect—complete; he had shot Latron purely for revenge, killed him in the most despicable manner. For there was no doubt Latron was dead, was there, Avery?"

"None," Avery said huskily.

"That was the time you came into my employ, Avery, recommended to me by one of the men who had been closest to Latron. I was not connected with the Latron properties except as an adviser; but many papers relating to them must go inevitably through my hands. I was rather on the inside in all that concerned those properties. But I could not myself see the papers; I was blind; therefore I had to have others serve as eyes for me. And from the first, Avery, you served as my eyes in connection with all papers relating to the Latron properties. If anything ever appeared in those papers which might have led me to suspect that any injustice had been done in the punishment of Latron's murderer, it could reach me only through you. Nothing of that sort ever did reach me, Avery. You must have made quite a good thing out of it."

"What?"

"I say, your position here must have been rather profitable to you, Avery; I have not treated you badly myself, recognizing that you must often be tempted by gaining information here from which you might make money; and your other employers must have overbid me."

"I don't understand; I beg your pardon, Mr. Santoine, but I do not follow what you are talking about."

"No? Then we must go a little further. This last year a minor reorganization became necessary in some of the Latron properties. My friend, Gabriel Warden—who was an honest man, Avery—had recently greatly increased his interest in those properties; it was inevitable the reorganization should be largely in his hands. During his work with the Latron properties, Warden—the honest man, Avery—discovered the terrible injustice of which I speak.

"I do not need to draw your attention, Avery, to the very peculiar condition which followed Warden's death. Warden had certainly had communication with Overton of some sort; Overton's enemies, therefore, were unable to rid themselves of him by delivering him up to the police because they did not know how much Overton knew. When I found that Warden had made me his executor and I went west and took charge of his affairs, their difficulties were intensified, for they did not dare to let suspicion of what had been done reach me. There was no course open to them, therefore, but to remove Overton before my suspicions were aroused, even if it could be done only at desperate risk to themselves.

"What I am leading up to, Avery, is your own connection with these events. You looked after your own interests rather carefully, I think, up to a certain point. When—knowing who Eaton was—you got him into a polo game, it was so that, if your interests were best served by exposing him, you could do so without revealing the real source of your knowledge of him. But an unforeseen event arose. The drafts and lists relating to the reorganization of the Latron properties—containing the very facts, no doubt, which first had aroused Warden's suspicions—were sent me through Warden's office. At first there was nothing threatening to you in this, because their contents could reach me only through you. But in the uncertainty I felt, I had my daughter take these matters out of your hands.

"That night, Avery, you sent an unsigned telegram from the office in the village, almost within twenty-four hours my study was entered, the safe inaccessible to you was broken open, the contents were carried away. Do you suppose I do not know that one of the two men in the study last night was the principal whose agents had failed in two attempts to get rid of Overton for him, whose other agent—yourself, Avery—had failed to intercept the evidence which would have revealed the truth to me, so that, no longer trusting to agents, he himself had come in desperation to prevent my learning the facts? I realize fully, Avery, that by means of you my blindness and my reputation have been used for five years to conceal from the public the fact that Matthew Latron had not been murdered, but was still alive!"

Santoine heard Avery get up; he stood an instant and tried to speak, but his breath caught nervously; he made another effort.

"I didn't have anything to do with convicting Overton, or know anything about it until that part was all over; I never saw him till I saw him on the train. I didn't know Warden was going to be killed."

"But you were accessory to the robbery of my house last night and, therefore, accessory to the murder of Wallace Blatchford. Last night, too, knowing Overton was innocent of everything charged against him, you gave orders to fire upon him at sight and he was fired upon. And what were you telling Harriet when I came in? You have told the police that Overton is the murderer of Latron. Isn't that so the police will refuse to believe anything he may say and return him to the death cell for the sentence to be executed upon him? The law will call these things attempted murder, Avery."

The blind man heard Avery pacing the floor, and then heard him stop in front of him.

"What is it you want to know, sir?"

"Who killed Warden?"

"John Yarrow is his name; he was a sort of hanger-on of Latron's. I don't know where Latron picked him up."

"Was it he who also made the attack on the train?"

"Yes."

"Who was the other man on the train—the one that claimed the telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward?"

"His name's Hollock. He's titular owner of the place on the Michigan shore where Latron has been living. The telegram I sent night before last was addressed to his place, you know. He's been a sort of go-between for Latron and the men—those who knew—who were managing the properties. I'd never met him, though, Mr. Santoine, and I didn't know either him or Hollock on the train. As I said, I wasn't in the know about killing Warden."

"When did you learn who Eaton was, Avery?"

"The day after we got back here from the West I got word from Latron; they didn't tell me till they needed to use me." Avery hesitated; then he went on: "You understand, sir, about Latron's pretended death—a guide at the shooting lodge had been killed by a chance shot in the woods; purely accidental; some one of the party had fired at a deer, missed, and never knew he'd killed a man with the waste shot. When the guide didn't come back to camp, they looked for him and found his body. He was a man who never would be missed or inquired for and was very nearly Latron's size; and that gave Latron the idea.

"At first there was no idea of pretending he had been murdered; it was the coroner who first suggested that. Things looked ugly for a while, under the circumstances, as they were made public. Either the scheme might come out or someone else be charged as the murderer. That put it up to Overton. He'd actually been up there to see Latron and had had a scene with him which had been witnessed. That part—all but the evidence which showed that he shot Latron afterward—was perfectly true. He thought that Latron, as he was about to go to trial, might be willing to give him information which would let him save something from the fortune he'd lost through Latron's manipulations. The circumstances, motive, everything was ready to convict Overton; it needed very little more to complete the case against him."

"So it was completed."

"But after Overton was convicted, he was not allowed to be punished, sir."

Santoine's lips straightened in contempt. "He was not allowed to be punished?"

"Overton didn't actually escape, you know, Mr. Santoine—that is, he couldn't have escaped without help; Latron was thoroughly frightened and he wanted it carried through and Overton executed; but some of the others rebelled against this and saw that Overton got away; but he never knew he'd been helped. I understand it was evidence of Latron's insistence on the sentence being carried out that Warden found, after his first suspicions had been aroused, and that put Warden in a position to have Latron tried for his life, and made it necessary to kill Warden."

"Latron is dead, of course, Avery, or fatally wounded?"

"He's dead. Over—Eaton, that is, sir—hit him last night with three shots."

"As a housebreaker engaged in rifling my safe, Avery."

"Yes, sir. Latron was dying when they took him out of the car last night. They got him away, though; put him on the boat he'd come on. I saw them in the woods last night. They'll not destroy the body or make away with it, sir, at present."

"In other words, you instructed them not to do so until you found out whether Overton could be handed over for execution and the facts regarding Latron kept secret, or whether some other course was necessary."

The blind man did not wait for any answer to this; he straightened suddenly, gripping the arms of his chair, and got up. There was more he wished to ask; in the bitterness he felt at his blindness having been used to make him an unconscious agent in these things of which Avery spoke so calmly, he was resolved that no one who had shared knowingly in them should go unpunished. But now he heard the noise made by approach of Eaton's captors. As Santoine stood listening, the sounds without became coherent to him.

"They have taken Overton, Avery," he commented. "Of course they have taken no one else. I shall tell those in charge of him he is not the one they are to hold prisoner but that I have another for them here."

The blind man heard no answer from Avery. Those having Overton in charge seemed to be coming into the house; the door opened and there were confused sounds.

Then Santoine heard his daughter's voice in a half cry, half sob of hopeless appeal to him. Harriet ran to him; he felt her cold, trembling fingers clasping him and beseeching him. "Father! Father! They say—they say—they will—"

He put his hands over hers, clasping hers and patting it. "My dear," he said, "I thought you would wait for me; I told you to wait."

He heard others coming into the house now; and he held his daughter beside him as he faced them.

"Who is in charge here?" he demanded.

The voice of one of those who had just come in answered him. "I, sir—I am the chief of police."

"I wish to speak to you; I will not keep you long. May I ask you to have your prisoner taken to the room he occupied here in my house and given attention by a doctor? You can have my word that it is not necessary to guard him. Wait! Wait!" he directed, as he heard exclamations and ejaculations to correct him. "I do not mean that you have mistaken who he is. He is Hugh Overton, I know; it is because he is Hugh Overton that I say what I do."

Santoine abandoned effort to separate and comprehend or to try to answer the confusion of charge and questioning around him. He concerned himself, at the moment, only with his daughter; he drew her to him, held her and said gently, "There, dear; there! Everything is right. I have not been able to explain to you, and I cannot take time now; but you, at least, will take my word that you have nothing to fear for him—nothing!"

The Voice of One of Those Who Had Just Come in Answered Him. "I, sir—I Am the Chief of Police.

He heard her gasp with incredulity and surprise; then she drew back from him, staring at him, she breathed deep with relief and clasped him, sobbing. He still held her, as the hall was cleared and the footsteps of those carrying Overton went up the stairs; then, knowing that she wished to follow them, he released her. She drew away, then clasped his hand and kissed it; as she did so, she suddenly stiffened and her hand tightened on his spasmodically.

Someone else had come into the hall and he heard another voice—a woman's, which he recognized as that of the stenographer, Miss Davis.

"Where is he? Hugh! Hugh! What have you done to him? Mr. Santoine! Mr. Santoine! Where is he?"

The blind man straightened, holding his daughter to him; there was anxiety, horror, love in the voice he heard; Harriet's perplexity was great as his own.

"Is that you, Miss Davis?" he inquired.

"Yes; yes," the girl repeated. "Where is—Hugh, Mr. Santoine?"

"You do not understand," the voice of a young man broke in on them.

"I'm afraid I don't," Santoine said quietly.

"She is Hugh's sister, Mr. Santoine—she is Edith Overton."

"Edith Overton? And who are you?"

"You do not know me. My name is Lawrence Hillward."

Santoine asked nothing more for the moment. His daughter had left his side. He stood an instant listening to the confusion of question and answer in the hall; then he opened the door into the library and held it for the police chief to enter.

CHAPTER XXIV

"It's All Right, Hugh"—at Last.

Eaton—he still, with the habit of five years of concealment, even thought of himself by that name—awoke to full consciousness at eight o'clock the next morning. He was in the room he had occupied before in Santoine's house; the sunlight, reflected from the lake, was playing on the ceiling. His wounds had been dressed; his body was comfortable and without fever.

He saw and recognized, against the lighted square of the window, a man standing looking out at the lake.

"Lawrence," he said.

The man turned and came toward the bed. "Yes, Hugh."

Eaton raised himself excitedly upon his pillows. "Lawrence, that was he—last night—in the study. It was Latron! I saw him! You'll believe me, Lawrence—you at least will. They got away on a boat—they must be followed—" With the first return of consciousness he had taken up again that battle against circumstances which had been his only thought for five years.

But suddenly he was aware that his sister was also in the room, sitting upon the opposite side of the bed. Her hand came forward and clasped his; she bent over him, holding him and fondling him.

"It is all right, Hugh," she whispered—"oh, Hugh! it is all right now. Mr. Santoine knows; he—he was not what we thought him. He believed all the while that you were justly sentenced. Now he knows otherwise—"

"He—Santoine—believed that?" Eaton asked incredulously.

"Yes; he says his blindness was used by them to make him think so. So now he is very angry; he says no one who had anything to do with it shall escape. He figured it all out—most wonderfully—that it must have been Latron in the study. He has been working all night—they have already made several arrests and every port on the lake is being watched for the boat they got away on."

"Is that true, Edith? Lawrence, is it true?"

"Yes; quite true, Hugh!" Hillward choked and turned away.

Eaton sank back against his pillows; his eyes—dry, bright and filled still with questioning for a time, as he tried to appreciate what he just had heard and all that it meant to him—dampened suddenly as he realized that it was over now, that long struggle to clear his name from the charge of murder—the fight which had seemed so hopeless. He could not realize it to the full as yet; concealment, fear, the sense of monstrous injustice done him had marked so deeply all his thoughts and feelings that he could not sense the fact that they were gone for good. So what came to him most strongly now was only realization that he had been set right with Santoine—Santoine, whom he himself had misjudged and mistrusted. And Harriet? He had not needed to be set right with her; she had believed and trusted him from the first, in spite of all that had seemed against him. Gratitude warmed him as he thought of her—and that other feeling, deeper, stronger far than gratitude, or than anything else he ever had felt toward anyone but her, surged up in him and set his pulses wildly beating, as his thought strained toward the future.

"Where is—Miss Santoine?" he asked.

His sister answered. "She has been helping her father. They left word they were to be sent for as soon as you woke up, and I've just sent for them."

Eaton lay silent till he heard them coming. The blind man was unfamiliar with this room; his daughter led him in. Her eyes were very bright, her cheeks, which had been pale, flushed as she met Eaton's look, but she did not look away. He kept his gaze upon her.

Santoine, under her guidance, took the chair Hillward set beside the bed for him. The blind man was very quiet; he felt for and found Eaton's hand and pressed it. Eaton choked, as he returned the pressure. Then Santoine released him.

"Who else is here?" the blind man asked his daughter.

"Miss Overton and Mr. Hillward," she answered.

Santoine found with his blind eyes their positions in the room and acknowledged their presence; afterward he turned back to Eaton.

"I understand, I think, everything now, except some few particulars regarding yourself," he said. "Will you tell me those?"

"You mean—" Eaton spoke to Santoine, but he looked at Harriet. "Oh, I understand, I think. When I—escaped, Mr. Santoine, of course my picture had appeared in all the newspapers and I was not safe from recognition anywhere in this country. I got into Canada and, from Vancouver, went to China. We had very little money left, Mr. Santoine. What had not been—lost, through Latron had been spent in my defense. I got a position in a mercantile house over there. It was a good country for me; people over there don't ask questions for fear someone will ask questions about them. We had no near relatives for Edith to go to and she had to take up stenography to support herself and—and change her name, Mr. Santoine, because of me."

"Go on," said Santoine. "You thought I knew who Latron's murderer was and morally, though not technically, perjured myself at your trial to convict you in his place. What next?"

"That was it," Eaton assented. "We thought you knew that some of those around you who served as your eyes must know it, too."

Harriet gasped. Eaton, looking at her, knew that she understood now what had come between them when she had told him that she herself had served as her father's eyes all through the Latron trial. He felt himself flushing as he looked at her; he could not understand now how he could have believed that she had aided in concealing an injustice against him, no matter what influence had been exerted upon her. She was all good; all true.

"At first," Eaton went on, "Edith did not find out anything. Then, this year, she learned that there was to be a reorganization of some of the Latron properties. We hoped that, during that, something would come out which might help us. I had been away almost five years; my face was forgotten, and we thought I could take the chance of coming back to be near at hand so I could act if anything did come out. Lawrence met me at Vancouver. We were about to start east when I received a message from Mr. Warden. I did not know Warden and I don't know now how he knew who I was or where he could reach me. His message merely said he knew I needed help and he was prepared to give it and made an appointment for me to see him at his house. You know what happened when I tried to keep the appointment.

"Then you came to Seattle and took charge of Warden's affairs. I felt certain that if there was any evidence among Warden's effects as to who had killed Latron, you would take it back with you with the other matters relating to the Latron reorganization. You could not recognize me from your having been at my trial because you were blind; I decided to take the train with you and try to get possession of the draft of the reorganization agreement and the other documents with it which Warden had been working on. I had suspected that I was being watched by agents of the men protecting Latron's murderer while I was in Seattle. I had changed my lodgings there because of that, but Lawrence had remained at the old lodgings to find out for me. He found there was a man following me who disappeared after I had taken the train, and Lawrence, after questioning the gateman at Seattle decided the man had taken the same train I did. He wired me in the cipher we had sometimes used in communicating with each other, but not knowing what name I was using on the train, he addressed it to himself, confident that if a telegram reached the train addressed to 'Lawrence Hillward' I would understand and claim it.

"Of course, I could not follow his instructions and leave the train; we were snowed in. Besides, I could not imagine how anybody could have followed me onto the train, as I had taken pains to prevent that very thing by being the last passenger to get aboard it."

"The man whom the gateman saw did not follow you; he merely watched you get on the train and notified two others, who took the train at Spokane. They had planned to get rid of you after you left Seattle so as to run less risk of your death being connected with that of Warden. It was my presence which made it necessary for them to make the desperate attempt to kill you on the train."

"Then I understand. The other telegram was sent me, of course, by Edith from Chicago, when she learned here that you were using the name of Dorne on your way home. I learned from her when I got here that the documents relating to the Latron properties, which I had decided you did not have with you, were being sent you through Warden's office. Through Edith I learned that they had reached you and had been put in the safe. I managed to communicate with Hillward at the country club, and that night he brought me the means of forcing the safe.

Two Games Played But No Decision

Dows Game Friday Goes Four Innings 3 to 2—Clarion Game Ends 6-6 Tie.

PLAY AT GARNER FRIDAY

The base ball season, like the spring, seems to have had a hard job arriving. The first game, called last Saturday between the Belmond and Dows high school teams, was called at the end of the fourth inning with the score three to two, Belmond having the long end. Rain stopped the fray. Monday the Clarion team came over, and a real game was witnessed, so far as it went, six innings. It was called then on account of darkness, with the score a tie, six to six. This game was a good one, with both teams battling on about even terms. Bemond started with a whoop, scoring four runs before Clarion woke up. The county seat lads then turned loose their heavy artillery, and batted themselves to a 6-5 lead in the fourth inning. Belmond came back in the fifth and tied the score. This is Clarion's first team in three years, and evidently some mighty good material is there which will develop into a fast team before long. Madsen and Tyrrell for Belmond, and G. Schnutt and L. Wilson for Clarion, were the batteries.

GETS $2,000 DAMAGES

Arthur Hansen, of Rowan was given $2,000 damages against Geo. Aldrich, also of Rowan, in district court last week. The case grew out of an unfortunate affair last winter. On December 24 last year Hansen, was driving home from a Christmas celebration when his car stalled. He stepped into the road to hail an approaching car, driven by Aldrich. Aldrich not recognizing him thought it was a "hold up", and stepped on the gas, striking Hansen and badly injuring him. At the time of the accident it is understood Aldrich offered to settle for a sum equal to half the hospital and physician's bill, but Hansen refused, and later brought suit for $5,000 damages.

ROBBERY AT CRYSTAL LAKE

Crystal Lake was visited by thieves last Monday night, and a considerable amount of goods and money taken. Two elevators and the Juhl store were robbed. Tools to make an entrance were stolen from the garage, and with these the thieves pried open the basement door of the store. The safe was blown, and $90 in stamps and $27 in cash taken. Mr. Juhl and wife, sleeping above, heard the explosion and securing his gun Juhl took a shot at the man on guard, scaring him away. $1,300 in bonds were also taken, but as they are registered they are useless to the thieves. At one elevator they secured $10. Authorities were immediately notified, but no trace was secured of the bandits. It is thought there were three, and possibly four, of them, and that they were the same lot who recently committed the robbery at Ventura.

STATE GETS BLACK ROOSTER

A black rooster has been presented to the state of Iowa. His stuffed remains, that is. "Jack Pershing" was a black rooster, so named in honor of General Pershing during the war. He first came to public notice at Braton, Iowa, where he was auctioned off for the benefit of the Red Cross by D. R. Jones. His first sale brought $292. Jones dropped his work and taking the rooster, toured the middle west selling the bird for the Red Cross At Adair his second sale brought $520. From then on the amounts went higher and higher. In South Dakota some of his sales were $2,686, $3,102, $4,221, $5,040, and the limit was reached when the bird brought $7,076. In all, he was sold about 9,000 times, for a total of $40,000. The sales plan used consisted in selling the fowl to someone for a specified amount, the money being considered a donation to the Red Cross, and the rooster going on to the next place. He has been stuffed and presented to the state with a place of fame in the Iowa historical building.

Testing Association Is Coming Nicely

First Month's Records Have Been Taken And Members Given Individual Test.

273 COWS ARE TESTED.

According to reorts of R. L. Payne, official tester for the Belmond Cow Testing association, the first month's work in the association has been completed and each member of the association has had one official test made. According to Mr. Payne's reports, 273 cows have been tested showing a total production of 138,490 pounds of milk giving a total of 5,607.4 pounds of butter fat with an average butter fat test of 4.04 per cent.

According to his monthly records, there are three cows in the association which are producing over fifty pounds of butter fat each, per month. Virgil Cook, who lives about six miles northeast of Belmond, has the high producing cow with a record of 54.3 pounds of butter fat. His records show, also, that there are fifteen cows which are producing forty pounds or more of butter fat per month.

One noticeable feature of the association is the fact that purebred bulls are used on all farms where the test is being made. This is evidence of the fact that these farmers are convinced of the importance of the use of purebred sires in grading up a dairy herd. According to Mr. Payne's reports, there are twenty-eight purebred dairy cows in the association. He reports there is great interest being taken in the work and that the closest cooperation is being given by the association members.

WHAT ABOUT A BAND?

Is Belmond going to have a band this year? If so, is it not about time something was being done about it? If not, alright. Garner has their band in fine shape, due to practices thruout the winter. Hampton has been enjoying band concerts during the winter. Other towns have or are making arrangements for summer concerts. Eagle Grove voted a municipal tax last year which raised $1,100, but the council thought this was too much and sliced off a couple hundred. As a result, there is insufficient funds, and there will be no band. Belmond needs concerts; has anybody anything to say?

NEW JURORS CALLED

So many of the jurors called last month were farmers, who were excused on account of the spring work starting, that a new draft has been made. Among those called are the following from this end of the county:

Senior Class Play To Be Given May 11

Class Are Hard At Work On Humorous Play—Said To be One Of Best Ever.

TO BE "DADDY LONG-LEGS"

The baseball game with Dows last Friday could not be finished on account of the heavy rain. It was postponed until May 15.

Six innings were played with Clarion Monday afternoon. The game was a tie, 6 to 6.

The Annual is at the press this week. It will be out about May 20.

Work on the class play "Daddy Long Legs" is progressing in fine shape. May 11, is the date set for the play. Keep that date in mind as no one will want to miss "Daddy Long-Legs".

Baseball game with Garner, Friday afternoon. Our boys go to Garner.

This week started the last six weeks of school. These last weeks will be very busy for everyone. Report cards are out this week.

"Daddy Long-Legs" enjoyed a two years run in New York and was then toured for over three years. It is now released for the first time for amateur production.

KLEMME TO HAVE FIRE TRUCK

The agitation at Klemme for a chemical truck for the fire department seems to have reached a head and the city council there now has under consideration several types of trucks, which are being investigated with a view to purchasing. The Times last week stated that it was practically assured that such a truck will be procured and enumerates at length the advantages of such equipment.

LUTHERANS MEET AT DOWS

The Eagle Grove circuit of the Norwegian Lutheran church holds a three-day devotional meeting at Dows, May first to third. Rev. G. G. Belsheim will be in charge. The scripture text to be considered is Acts 4, 5-15. Rev. J. Wargberg, of Roife, preaches the initial sermon Tuesday, May 1, at 10:30. Three sessions are usually conducted exclusively in the English language.

NO OBJECTION TO PAVING

The city council of Clear Lake met last week to hear the objection of citizens there to a schedule of proposed paving. Not an objector appeared; evidently sentiment was unanimously in favor of extending the pavement program in Clear Lake. It is proposed to add materially to the paving there this summer. Clear Lake appears to have a highly progressive streak this year, the Commercial Club there having just completed a boosting tour thruout Iowa as far as Omaha.

A. A. Nihoof is gradually getting better from his illness. Mr. Nihoof has been confined to his home for the past 10 or 12 weeks, suffering from the flu, followed by bronchitis.

COURT HOUSE NOTES

Monitor—The grand jury made a raid on the bootlegging business last week and as a result several indictments were returned. H. M. Paul is in the county jail awaiting trial and others will be rounded up later. Proprietors of the Greek candy kitchen in Eagle Grove were also indicted for maintaining a nuisance but at their trial before their home town justice, following the adjournment of the grand jury, their case was dismissed.

Judge Thompson might rightly have termed Monday as "excuse day" in his court. Out of eighty-five jurors all but twenty-seven were excused. Most of them were farmers and there was no doubt as to the reasonableness of their excuses.

The $5,000 damage suit of Arthur Hanson vs. Geo. Aldrich, both of Rowan was begun Monday and will be concluded Wednesday. Last Christmas morning at 2 a. m., Hanson attempted to stop Aldrich's car in order to secure help as his lights were out. Aldrich thinking it was a hold up stepped on the gas and when Hanson did not get out of the way he was run down and badly injured, spending several weeks in the hospital, his bill being over $1,000. It is understood that defendatn offered to pay him half that amount.

While the count is not official it is reported that nearly twenty-five Wright county school teachers have been married this spring. All of which indicates that the teaching profession had its bright spots.

On Friday last thirteen foreign born men appeared before a representative of the government and Judge Fry to pass the examinations required for their final citizenship papers. Each would be citizen had two witnesses, who vouched for his integrity, and loyalty to the principles of the United States government.

Some of the questions asked by examiners would no doubt puzzle many of our American born citizens, who have had full advantage of the educational facilities of the country, but most of them were comparatively easy.

The answers to a number of the questions brought amused looks to the faces of the listeners, especially the ones pertaining to historical matters. One gentleman credited Ahraham Lincoln with being the first president. Another said that the Revolutionary war was between North and South America and that South America started the controversy. However, it was quite surprising the amount of practical knowledge most of the applicants had in regard to state and county affairs.

The government representative stated that classes in citizenship, under the supervision of the public schools, were being organized in several towns of the state, the purpose being to drill foreign born residents, who otherwise have desireable qualities, in the fundamentals of the government. Many foreigners who are thoroughly good in regard to character and ideals, are pitifully lacking in their knowledge of the affairs of the nation. He expressed a desire that such a class might be formed in Wright county.

The following are the names of those who received their final papers, together with the former country, their present place of residence, and the year of emigration:

John Schnell, Russia, Goldfield, 1903.

Conrad Meints, Germany, Belmond, 1902.

John Wientjes, Germany, Belmond, 1902.

Charley Peddle, England, Rowan, 1900.

H. F. Miller, Germany, Clarion, 1891.

Andrew Jorgenson, Denmark, Belmond, 1916.

J. H. Rydland, Norway, Eagle Grove, 1910.

Garrett Sandman, Germany, Belmond, 1911.

John Smit, Germany, Bemond, 1909.

Kriestian Jensen, Denmark, Goldfield, 1911.

Miss Huglin, a special worker from Cedar Falls spent Tuesday and Wednesday of this week with the rural teachers of the county doing consulative work. She will spend Thursday and Friday in the Goldfield schools.

Operation of Sugar Factory Assured

Overhauling Of Plant To Begin Within Short Time—Adams To Be Superintendent.

4,000 ACRES CONTRACTED

The Belmond beet sugar factory will operate this year. This is now an assured fact, sufficient acreage now being contracted to warrant operation. While it had been expected that the factory would be operated, and plans made therefore, it had been doubtful for several weeks on account of acreage, which was not up to last year.

Now, however, the Iowa Valley Operating Co., has approximately 4,000 acres contracted, which is more than was used last season. More acreage is being taken on each day, and ultimately the company may have between 4,500 and 5,000 acres of beets for this year's campaign. Due to the late spring, with the cold weather, many farmers who had decided not to raise beets this year are reconsidering, and contracting for a good acreage of sugar beets. With a larger acreage than last year and a market that has every indication of being higher than before, sugar beets would appear to be a money-making crop, and a successful campaign this year assured.

Work in repairing and overhauling the factory will begin in a short time. The supervision of this will be under W H. Adams, formerly with the Iowa Valley Sugar Co., and well known to Belmond people. Mr. Adams will be the superintendent of the plant this year, and as he is a man thoroly familiar with the sugar business the company will be certain of efficient management all the way thru. Mr. Adams has been back East the past year or two.

Seed and fertilizer will be sent out the first of next week to the growers. Every prospect this year is for a good crop at good prices. Under the 50-50 contract a profit is assured, in any event, and with a good yield both growers and company should enjoy a very prosperous year.

EDITORIAL

ON THINGS IN GENERAL

The standpat Republican newspapers in this senatorial district—and elsewhere, as well—have been doing their best to "explain" the defeat of McFerren and the Election of a Democrat, Schmedika, to the position left vacant by the death of the late Cady Chase. Universally they declare the decision of the voters was because Hardin county had been ignored so long—20 years, we believe—in a senatorial representative. Schmedika ran independently, and he was from Hardin county. Consequently Hardin county was determined to have him over McFerren. Schmedika polled a majority there of over 700. McFerren carried Wright and Hamilton counties by narrow margins. Must have been some folks in these two counties who wanted Schmedika also. "Explanations" are uncalled for; Schmedika won not because Hardin county wanted him, not because McFerren failed to hustle, not because the voters thought he knew the ropes better, but because the people knew too well, and had had too much of, McFerren. The old guard, in nominating McFerren, cut their own throats.

At that, a good man was finally elected.

The other day, in our mail, was a letter from an "Oil Company" down south, who would like to have a copy of the Independent, please, and the Subscription price of same. Would we please send same at once? We would not, and the waste basket grew a little fuller. How handy the small town paper, the country press, with its many names and addresses of people with more or less money in the bank; solid, substantial rural citizens who pay as they go, and keep a little laid by. A nice little list can be compiled, to which beautifully colored circulars and enthusiastic letters containing glowing description of the wealth to be made in oil can be mailed. And at a trifling sum—the price of the subscription.

There are some folks no decent, self-respecting newspaper wants on its list.

How any right-minded person can ride over the dirt roads this past week, and then holler against better roads, we fail to see. Iowa's mud roads are famous—or infamous, as you wish to see them—the country over. As an advertisement of the State they are as good as a drunkard is to the booze manufacturers Economically they are a dead loss; many a load of grain or hogs has failed to reach market because of have been same folks in these two had ben ignored so long—20 years, will overbalance many times the cost of improvement. The remedy? Gravel.

The ruins of the Big Blaze are fast being removed. The scars are less ugly, and the wounds fast healing. It is hard that there must be suffering thru such events, but it is good for the town, for upon the ruins will be builded a better Belmond. It is hard to do away with old things; association at times over-rules judgement; sentiment keeps many things which should be thrown away. If new, modern buildings spring up to cover the scars of the fire, it will be a step forward for the town.

And Belmond needs some new buildings.

Whether you believe in sugar beets or not; whether you have a dime in the local factory or not; you ought to realize what the operation of the factory means to Belmond. Turning loose in any community of this size, $50,000, means a great stimulant to business. Turning loose several hundred thousands means just that much more. It means bad debts paid, old bills settled, savings accounts started, things purchased which it was thought could not be afforded. These things some of us know from first hand knowledge. It means work for many; work in a slack time; an opportunity to lay by, to get ahead. It means business, good business, business for all, that will benefit directly or indirectly nearly every individual in the community. To the grower of beets, it means ready money, cash, which immediately gets into your pocket, and from your pocket to the man you owe, or for something you want, and from there someplace else, and it travels around, touching everywhere. It means progress.

We all admit that the American educational system is not perfect; but neither is any other. Many things are needed; many things perhaps should be changed; but it's a good system, a better system each year. The old days of readin' 'ritin' and 'rithmatic are no more; once they were sufficient, nowadays they are fundamental, but not all. Modern days require different methods, different ways. Perhaps our methods are not exactly right, but we are improving them. No system of education in the world equals that of America's, imperfect as it may be in many ways. We all hold some belief of changes that should be made, of the way some things should be done. Naturally. But let's admit that we're doing pretty well, as it is.

Firestone

will not increase prices until May 1st

Firestone Prices on Fabric and Cord Passenger Car Tires and Tubes, also Solid and Pneumatic Truck Tires Will Advance May 1st

The postponement of this price revision is possible only because of our realization of the price danger in the British Crude Rubber Restriction Act which became effective November 1, 1922. We were fortunate in our rubber purchases before the Restriction Act increased the price of crude rubber 150%.

We have always endeavored to champion the cause of better made tires delivered at lowest cost to the tire user by economic manufacturing and distribution. And we are glad of the opportunity to give the car-owner the additional saving at this time.

Firestone Cords embody certain special processes which result in their producing mileage records, heretofore unheard-of in the industry. Among the more important of these superior methods are blending, tempering, air-bag cure and double gum-dipping.

Firestone Dealers are co-operating with us in our movement to supply your needs at present prices as long as their stock lasts and we have advised our dealers that we will supply them with additional tires this month only so far as our output will permit.

See the nearest Firestone Dealer. Purchase a set of these Gum-Dipped Cords. Prove for yourself their remarkable mileage advantages and easy riding qualities.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Orchard-Poultry Demonstration Instructive.

The orchard-poultry demonstrations which were held in Wright county Monday and Tuesday of last week proved to be very interesting and instructive to the farmers who found it possible to attend. In spite of the fact that the spring seeding was well under way, the demonstrations were attended by good sized groups of farmers and farmers' wives who were interested in these two subjects.

Prof. H. E. Nichols, orchard specialist and S. W. Henn, poultry specialist, were in charge of these demonstrations. Actual demonstrations on the pruning of orchard trees were given at these meetings and lectures on spraying and caring for the farm orchard as well as valuable hints on poultry production were also given. The demonstrations were conducted at the following farms: R. E. Lee Aldrich, C. B. Tongate, P. Veldhouse, Alfred Hanson.

Organize Girls Garment Clubs

Miss Florence Forbes, assistant state leader of girls' club work in Iowa, conducted a meeting at the county agent's office last Wednesday afternoon for the purpose of reorganizing the girls' garment clubs of last year and to organize new clubs for this year's work.

A girls' club committee consisting of six members was appointed at this meeting and the duties of this committee will be to organize the girls' club work for the year and to assist the various club leaders in carrying on this work. Twelve interested ladies from various parts of the county were in attendance at this meeting and assisted Miss Forbes and the county agent in organizing the girls' club work. The ladies who were elected on the county girls' club committee are as follows: Mrs. M. L. Clark, Lake township, chairman; Mrs. L. F. Dorr, Grant township; Mrs. J. D. McVicker, Troy; Mrs. E. E. Maxheimer, Dayton; Mrs. H. N. Denby, Lake; Miss Lydia Richards, Lincoln. Those in attendance at this meeting were as follows: Mrs. J. E. Kirstein, Mrs. N. E. Schroeder, Mrs. J. B. Tiara, Mrs. M. G. Luick, Mrs F. N. Littlefield, Mrs. L. F. Dorr, Mrs. M. L. Clark, Mrs. H. N. Denby, Mrs. A. L. Middleton, Mrs. Harry Woodley, Mrs. Harry Sumners and one visitor.

Since Wright county is without a home demonstration agent, it has been thought best to have a girls' club committee to cooperate with the county agent in carrying on the garment club work. It will be remembered that there were nine active garment clubs in our county last year and it is hoped that we will be able to continue these nine clubs and organize about six more clubs in different territories where there is the demand for this type of work.

Special Farm Bureau Edition

The Wright County Farm Bureau in cooperation with the extension department at Ames and one of the county papers will put on a special farm bureau edition sometime during the latter part of May. The object of this special edition will be to advertise Wright county and its resources. An effort will be made to tell in an interesting way about the farms and farmers of Wright county. Business men and farmers alike will be asked to contribute stories about Wright county and its wonderful crops, livestock and farm homes. No effort will be spared to present facts concerning the work of the farm bureau in every phase. The farm and farm bureau news and information which will be presented in this edition will be gathered from official sources, the general information coming from the statistics and publicity bureaus of the state and the national organizations, and the local information and news relative to the work and conditions in this county will be obtained from the county agent and from personal farm visits to the homes of those who are producing farm crops and livestock of unusual interest.

County Agent Edwards will be assisted materially by H. J. Metcalf of the information service of the extension department at Ames, in getting out this special edition of the farm bureau news. An effort will be made to have the people themselves write the articles which will go into this publication. A training school will be held at the county agent's office on May 3rd for the purpose of giving special instruction to those who are planning to contribute material. Every man, woman and child of Wright county will be asked to contribute to this special edition which will go into every farm home.

The object of this special edition is not for mercenary profit for there will be little, if any, but primarily to further the interests of our rural enterprises which is bound to reflect good upon our urban communities. The farmer has come to know that he carries on the greatest industry in the world and in this realization there comes the need of publicity and business intercourse. Our rural people have awakened to the fact that the need of a good town is as important as the need of good farms and good livestock is to the merchant and people of the city and much credit is due the newspapers of our county in bringing about this condition. The farmer is no longer a man who merely lives works and dies on a tract of land. The modern successful farmer is a scientist, a student and a skilled artisan. No vocation has gone forward with greater strides than farming or stock raising and the day is nearing when the great farm bureau organization will be the world's greatest agency in bringing about stable conditions in all markets. The farmer is the real producer and the developer of the country's resouces and it should be the ambition of the business men of the city and of the country to jointly work for the community good. One without the other will make hard sledding for both. This special farm bureau edition will serve this purpose to more or less extent.

THE GAS TRAIL

There are 55,250 railroad passenger coaches in use, having a seating capacity of 2,270,000. The 9,500,000 automobile now in operation have seats for approximately 47,000,000.

In 1910 there were but 451,000 motor vehicles registered in the United States. On July 1, 1922 there were 10,608,127.

According to insurance company statistics, $9,500,000 was paid out for burned cars in 1922. The great part of this loss was the result of carelessness.

The United States has spent between $15,000,000,000 and $20,000,000,000 for automobiles and trucks in the last 15 years. More than $6,000,000,000 has been expended for improved roads.

In cold weather watch the radiation system. Use a good cleaning mixture to remove scale and mud. Also an anti-freeze spirit should be used in the radiator.

If you have been in the habit of using the same oil in summer as in winter, better change the habit as well as the oil.

It is estimated that the railroads carried 1,642,251,000 tons of freight in 1921, while motor trucks hauled 1,430,000,000 tons.

The thirteenth American Good Roads congress was held in Chicago this year. Eighty-five thousand invitations were sent to county and highway commissioners, mayors and others. Uniform state highway traffic regulation was a principal topic of information.

In September, 1922, 16.5 persons in every 100,000 of population were killed as a result of automobile accidents.

Only one make of American car has 12 cylinders. Fourteen are made with eight, 94 with six and 37 with four.

The first automobile accident on record occurred in 1896 when a Mr. Jonathan West collided with a laundry wagon.

A bent front axle, no matter how slight, not only causes poor steering but will soon prematurely wear the tread of both front tires.

Traffic violators in Sioux City, Ia are required to spend at least two hours in a school maintained by the police for teaching the city's traffic rules.

A car should never be washed in sunlight. The direct rays of the sun striking on water causes heating which, of course, affects the paint, enamel, or varnish.

Speeding and overloading are two of the chief contributing causes for tire trouble. Striking a stone, or even a rut, at a fifty mile clip will damage the best of tires and the strain may not show up for weeks.

COURT HOUSE OFFICIALS CAPTURE $25 REWARD

Webster City News—There was considerable excitement at the court house this morning when it was realized by County Clerk W H. Cunningham that a German Police dog, for which a standing reward of $25 has been offered for some three weeks, was playing about on the court house lawn. Every newspaper in the state has carried a reward of $25 for information leading to the return of a female German Police dog, answering to the name of Gretchen, strayed away from the fine kennels of Mrs. Ruth Reeve-Keefe, at Waucome Kennels, just east of Hampton, three weeks ago.

Mr. Cunningham, aided by his deputy Miss Fanny Baxter and both Sheriff Carl and his deputy Chas. Blair, all pussy-footed around the dog-aristocrat and the latter, who was advertised to be very fond of ladies and children, was easily captured by Miss Baxter. Mr. Cunningham at once telephone the Waucome Kennels and Mr. Keefe drove over at once and paid the reward.

The court house officials are consequently celebrating. The dog has a real history. She is a half-sister of "Strongheart" of movie fame, and the father of both was Kriminalpolizi-Dusternbrook. She has several pups that are three months old and is herself, two years old. The dog is one of the finest in this section and news of her loss was radio-graphed from Davenport almost immediately. The long distance telephone at the farm has been kept warm with calls from persons who thought they had seen the dog, but no actual trace of her was found until Sunday when she was seen at Belmond. Mr. Keefe drove over 100 miles on Sunday trying to locate the valuable animal.

The Waucome Kennels at Homestead Farm now have 14 valuable German Police dogs and the supply is never equal to the demand, Mr. Keefe says. The poor animal is footsore and weary and thin. She has travelled many weary miles on her search for home and was evidently making for home when she reached this city. She was lost while out hunting with other dogs after rabbits. She struck the graveled highway leading north thru Hampton and thinking she was on the home road, evidently traveled north as far as Mason City then west and was swinging about in a circle to reach home when she was seen here.

SALARY OF CITY SUPERINTENDENTS ON THE INCREASE

That there is a close relationship between salaries and service is indicated by increases of salaries that have been granted school superintendents in various parts of the state this year. Over in Richland Township Consolidated school, Adair county, the board of education has increased the salary of the superintendent from $2,000 to nearly $3,000. This is a splendid tribute to the character of service rendered by Supt. J. E Cunde who has had charge of the schools there ror the past year. Increases in salaries, though in lesser amounts, have been granted superintendents of schools at Manchester, Knoxville, Storm Lake, Riverside, Schleswig and Osceola. There is a growing tendency to take advantage of the provision in the law that enables boards of education to contract with city superintendents for a term of years. More three year contaacts have been made this spring than at any time since the adoption of the statute. R. L. Hamilton, assistant superintendent of schools at Sioux City, in a recent address before the Northwest Iowa Teachers association says, "There is no such thing as a teachers' union because that connotes that we must affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, but the teachers must build up the spirit of edcuation by organization."

Advice is never cheap. It is valuable or it leads to trouble and is therefore expensive.

Lost opportunities never bother a fellow who doesn't realize that he has lost them.

Griesy's Store News

Vol. 2 BELMOND, IOWA, APRIL 26, 1923 No. 5

We are still taking orders for field seeds and can now furnish almost any grade you wish. And when speaking of seeds—have you seen our line of garden seeds in bulk and packages, onion sets and all lawn seeds?

Your Good Will Be Our Gain

sell costs us more than many twines we could buy, and even at the small profit we make, it may cost you just a little more than you might have to pay for a poor twine. But you must remember that the COST of twine to you is NOT what you pay for it, but what you get from it. Scattered grain, caused by weak, uneven twine which breaks or fails to knot, pays no profit. That's why we prefer to sell you good twine, guaranteed for length, strength and weight. You are safeguarded against shortage, poor tying and breakage when you use the good reliable "Big Ball" Deering Twine. Give us your order the next time you're in town.

Prices always right at our store.

And remember—meet your friends at Griesy's.

No man can make a high mark if he lies down on the job.

When two live cheaper than one they usually feel that way.

Quality is the result of experience 90 years of manufacturing experience make McCormick-Deering machines quality-built.

Planter Profits!

Your soil may be rich, your seed bed in A-I shape, the weather favorable and your seed of the very best, yet you are likely to have a poor stand unless your planter puts every hill in its place and makes every hill a full hill. Before you can get planter profits you must have a planter you can absolutely depend on. The International No. 8 is such a planter. It is designed and built with just one end in view—to drop accurately and to check evenly—to place every hill where it belongs and to make every hill a full one. Accuracy—that's it—and it spells planter profits for you. Buy and use an International No. 8 Corn Planter this year. We sell 'em.

Time to repair those implements you are going to use this year.

A LETTER

Our farm journals and newspapers carry numerous contributions and editorials regarding what is said to be an essential change which must be made in the type of hogs farmers must raise for market. They say farmers must raise hogs which will meet the packers' demand, that demand is for a "bacon" or "meat type" hog. They say the big type hog no longer is profitable for the farmer, because it is not the kind of hog the packers want.

I believe this propaganda is absolutely misleading. The Chicago packers promote and support a swine carcass contest every year at the International Live Stock Exposition. The barrow at the 1922 exposition which dressed out the highest percentage of edible meat, with seven breeds competing, was a big type Poland China, and all the barrows of the same breed made a higher average dressing out than the barrows of any other breed, "bacon" or "meat type" included. Mr. B. H. Heide, Sec. of the International, has released the figures for the 1922 carcass contest, the tabulated results of which follow:

No.	Breed	Av. Dress Out Percentage
17	Poland China barrows	82.7
11	Hampshire Barrows	82.5
14	Berkshire barrows	82.1
6	Tamworth barrows	81.7
18	Chester White	81.3
5	Duroc Jersey barrows	78.6

MESERVEY FARMER INVENTS AUTOMATIC HOG DOOR

Henry H. Pals, a farmer near Meservey, has invented, patented, and now has on the market, the Iowa Automatic Hog Door, an invention which looks pretty good. The door fits onto any building, frame of block, and is so arranged that it automatically closes after the hog has gone in or out, thus keeping the hog house warm in cold weather. It can be used to sort hogs, and made to stay open. It keeps chickens from the hog house, which means the chances of a chicken-eating hog are greatly diminished. The swine can go or came as they please, the door automatically shutting after them. A system of weights seems to be the secret, and according to the weight depends how fast or how slow the door closes. Mr. Pals has started manufacturing the doors, and already has placed a number of them, with many more in prospect.

Red Crown

The High-Grade Gasoline

Better Than Ever

There is an erroneous idea abroad. You hear it every day. "Gasoline is not as good as it used to be." The fact is that the Red Crown Gasoline you are getting today is an almost perfect fuel.

Perhaps there is no industry where progress has made such rapid strides as the refining of petroleum.

For example, we cite the Burton Process, developed and perfected in the laboratories of the Standard Oil Company (Indiana). The Burton Process has enabled the refiner to bring gasoline to a point of efficiency hitherto unhoped for.

Red Crown Is Made by the Burton Process

Red Crown vaporizes to the last drop. There is no waste—it produces instant starting Winter or Summer — a quick get-away — a smooth running engine—tremendous sustained pulling power and racing speed if you want it.

HOUSE AND SENATE DEADLOCKED TO LAST

(By G. L. Caswell)

Des Moines, April 25 1923.

Kidding themselves along for thirty hours past time of adjournment by stopping the big official clocks in both Senate and House, members of the Fortieth General Assembly ended their regular session last Wednesday afternoon at six o'clock. Protest after protest was filed against the strenuous rule but in each case it was squelched while a "call of the house" was in operation in each branch until the large appropriations for the state colleges and educational institutions could be settled. A call of the house or senate, when signed by a certain number of members, requires that every member shall be present during such time as the special question mentioned in the call is under pain of arrest, and any absent member is sent for and hunted till he is accounted for.

Thus sleepy and tired members dragged through the day Wednesday while conference committees tried in vain to settle the differences between House and Senate over the college appropriations. They lounged about and visited, told stories and smoked; then got pianos moved up and with some of the lady clerks at the keys the members sang all the songs they knew—an a lot more "Home Sweet Home" was a favorite

Appropriations Cut $8,000,000

Before this General Assembly there were appropriations asked for amounting to approximately $38,000,000, for the two years between sessions. This was a vast increase over any previous askings, and at a time when members generally were not favoring extraordinary expenditures which might mean increased taxes. Therefore the pruning knife was out all the way through the session, and it ended with appropriations allowed amounting to $30,709,413 for the two years.

The great contest at the end of the session came through a disagreement over the amount to be allowed to the three state colleges —Iowa City, Ames and Cedar Falls —for support, for maintenances of buildings, repairs, new work and buildings and for additional facilities to take care of increased attendance. The colleges asked for $2,526,797 more than they finally got for the biennial period. The Senate tried to raise this allowance a million; the House tried to cut it a million more. The third and last conference committees appointed by the presiding officers brought in a report within twenty minutes after retiring to talk it over, and their report was accepted at 5:35 Wednesday afternoon.

Under this settlement of the problem, it is said the colleges will raise their tuition fees and possibly limit the attendance so that Iowa students may be accommodated, at least. New dormitories at Iowa City, Ames, and Cedar Falls will be provided, and for the biennial period little other new building will be authorized.

State Tax Levy 10.13 Mills

The last act of the General Assembly was to comply with the constitution of the state and fix the tax levy to be enforced by the executive council. The Ways and Means committees found it will require a tax levy for state purposes of 10.13 mills per year to raise the $11,000,000 per annum the state government now requires from direct taxes. Added to this be the two mills for the soldiers' bonus.

Strange to say, many of the same members who fought so strenuously to cut down the college appropriations to save taxes, also fought against the only bill to specifically repeal any millage taxes during the present year. For this reason we know of no reduction in local tax levies that will result from this session, except possibly the two mills for road dragging funds in the township. When the gasoline tax bill was passed it was supposed the two mill township road levy was repealed with it, and the title to the gasoline tax bill so stated. But in the body of the bill the two mills tax was not specifically mentioned, and thus it remains as a tax to be levied by the board of supervisors and township trustees—unless they disregard the law, which many of them will likely do since road funds will be provided by the gasoline tax. Discovering this an emergency bill was prepared in the Senate Wednesday, repealing this two mill township road tax. It passed quickly and was sent to the House where it met with obstruction because of objection to consideration of a bill for passage on the same day it was offered, under the rules.

Special Session Started

Governor Kendall sent up to the House and Senate on Monday before adjournment a call for a special session to consider and complete revision of the Code of Iowa, said special session to start at 10 o'clock on Wednesday, April 18th.

Acting upon this call as the last thing before returning to their homes the members on Wednesday evening opened the special session, and after some debate voted to adjourn to December 4th next when the same members and the same official organizations of both houses will reconvene to undertake the Code revision, which has been only touched upon at this regular session.

But Few Changes in Laws

With all the 1600 bills offered in both houses and with all the discussions, and howl raised over certain matters presented during the session, there were perhaps fewer changes in the laws and less new laws resulting from this session than any that has been held for many years. Something happened to most of the bills offered.

Following are cited some of the largest and most important accomplishments of this Fortieth General Assembly:

Passage of the constitutional amendment which will permit women to be come members of the General Assembly.

Enactment of a political party bill to double the size of county central committees and providing for an equal number of men and women on such committees.

Consolidation of a dozen minor state departments into a department of agriculture, with a secretary of agriculture at the head and making this secretary a member of the executive council of the state. (Appointment of Raymond W. Cassidy of Whiting, as the first secretary of agriculture was confirmed by the Senate, giving to the state's service one of the best and most qualified men in the state.)

Passage of the gasoline tax law, under which all gasoline retailed in this state shall pay a state tax of two cents per gallon, the proceeds to be used in improvement of the primary and county road systems—one-third to go to primary road funds and two-third to secondary or county roads. The primary road money under this act will to each county in proportion to its area, and must be distributed in each county on the basis of assessed valuation of the townships, which will give to those roads near cities and towns a greater part of the money to improve such roads as are most traveled.

Among other highway laws passed is one allowing primary road funds to be used for any purpose approved by boards and the state highway commission and providing for refund of county moneys heretofore paid out for right of way.

Also giving county boards the right to refuse to hire county engineers.

Also authorizing use of primary road funds on other county roads after primary roads have all been improved.

Other present highway laws were left unchanged.

Motor Vehicle Tax Changed

Hereafter under one bill passed, motor vehicle license fees will be based upon current list price values of such cars instead of continuing under the price paid in any one year.

Motor bus lines and motor freight transportation lines will hereafter pay a tonnage tax per mile—one-eight cent per ton for soft tired trucks and one-fourth cent per ton-mile for solid rubber tires, and placing regulation of motor vehicles in passenger or freight transportation under the state railway commission.

Agriculture was considered in a helpful way by several acts that passed. One provides for creation of local warehousing board to supervise a system of issuing credits on grain stored in farmers' warehouses for borrowing money. Another extending the date when taxes shall become delinquent to the first of May and November in each year instead of April and October first.

New Liquor and Criminal Laws

Sale of liquor that causes death to be regarded as manslaughter; also extending right of search and seizure to materials used in making liquor; also providing for the confiscation by authorities of vehicles used in illegal transportation of liquor.

The anti-Ku Klux Klan bill providing penalties for persons using masks or disguises when committing crime or entering houses.

Reducing from six months to sixty days the time in which appeals may be taken in criminal cases.

Prizes offered in lotteries or gambling schemes may hereafter be seized and confiscated by the authorities.

Rural school boards are hereafter required to meet for organization the third Monday in March; also to publish financial statements and advance estimates of their budgets for the ensuing year.

Penalty for non-payment of poll tax is raised to two dollars.

To Offset Tuck Bill.

An emergency measure was passed which will permit counties to fund or refund indebtedness created prior to the first of January, 1924. This is an antidote for the Tuck bill passed previously in which counties are prohibited from expending any moneys more than the collectible amounts levied in any fund, under penalties which hold officials personally liable for such excess expenditures.

The law requiring public officers to make inventories of all property in their hands each year was repealed.

Continuing the present schedule of salaries provided for county officers.

One of the last bills passed was one requiring that nothing but pure bred stallions shall be registered and licensed.

Hundreds of Bills Failed

The list of bills for acts that failed of passage is as great and as important as the list of those passed.

The greatest attempt at constructive legislation for the whole state was perhaps in the Ways and Means committees new taxation program, mentioned heretofore. At the very last these three measures were discussed, contested and with drawn. They will appear again at the special session.

Several agricultural bills failed; also several banking bills, one increasing to $50,000 the amount of capital stock required to organize a new state bank, and another providing for state supervision of private banks.

The new gun toting law went down in defeat, as did also the bill penalizing the purchaser of liquor.

The presidental preference primary bill, and most other election bills went down also. The 35 per cent clause remains in the primary law; the Fulton bill legalizing party pre-primary conventions got nowhere; the law was not changed to require notice of change of party affiliation sixty days prior to election. County superintendents and members of the board of education will not be elected by direct vote of the people.

Fish and game laws did not get much change of any kind.

Insurance interests prevented any material change or regulation regarding either fire or life insurance.

Labor got several acts through they wanted and lost several.

his having used her in that way? He saw only sympathy in her face.

"My daughter told me that she helped you to that extent," Santoine offered, "and I understood later what must have been your reason for asking her to take you out that night."

"When I reached the study," Eaton continued, "I found others already there. The light of an electric torch flashed on the face of one of them and I recognized the man as Latron—the man for whose murder I had been convicted and sentenced! Edith tells me that you know the rest."

There was silence in the room for several minutes. Santoine again felt for Eaton's hand and pressed it. "We've tired you out," he said. "You must rest."

"You must sleep, Hugh, if you can," Edith urged.

Eaton obediently closed his eyes, but opened them at once to look for Harriet. She had moved out of his line of vision.

Santoine rose; he stood an instant waiting for his daughter, then suddenly he comprehended that she was no longer in the room. "Mr. Hillward, I must ask your help," he said, and he went out with Hillward guiding him.

Eaton, turning anxiously on his pillow and looking about the room, saw no one but his sister. He had known when Harriet moved away from beside the bed; but he had not suspected that she was leaving the room. Now suddenly a great fear filled him.

"Why did Miss Santoine go away? Why did she go, Edith?" he questioned.

"You must sleep, Hugh," his sister answered only.

Harriet, when she slipped out of the room, had gone downstairs. She could not have forced herself to leave before she had heard Hugh's story, and she could not define even to herself what the feeling had been that had made her leave as soon as he had finished; but she sensed the reason vaguely. Hugh had told her two days before, "I will come back to you as you have never known me yet"—and it had proved true. She had known him as a man in fear, constrained, carefully guarding himself against others and against betrayal by himself; a man to whom all the world seemed opposed; so that her sympathy—and afterward something more than her sympathy—had gone out to him. To that repressed and threatened man, she had told all she felt toward him, revealing her feelings with a frankness that would have been impossible except that she wanted him to know that she was ready to stand against the world with him.

Now the world was no longer against him; he had friends, a place in life was ready to receive him; he would be sought after, and his name would be among those of the people of his own sort. She had no shame that she had let him—and others—know all that she felt toward him; she gloried still in it; only now—now, if he wished her, he must make that plain; she could not, of herself, return to him.

So unrest possessed her and the suspense of something hoped for but ungudfilled. She went from room to room, trying to absorb herself in her daily duties; but the house—her father's house—spoke to her now only of Hugh and she could think of nothing but him. Was he awake? Was he sleeping? Was he thinking of her? Or, now that the danger was over through which she had served him, were his thoughts of someone else?

Her heart halted at each recurrence of that thought; and again and again she repeated his words to her at parting from her the night before. "I will come back to you as you have never known me yet!" To her he would come back, he said; to her, not to anyone else. But his danger was not over then; in his great extremity and in his need of her, he might have felt what he did not feel now. If he wanted her, why did he not send for her?

She stood trembling as she saw Edith Overton in the hall.

"Hugh has been asking for you continually, Miss Santoine. If you can find time, please go in and see him."

Harriet did not know what answer she made. She went upstairs; she ran, as soon as she was out of sight of Hugh's sister; then, at Hugh's door, she had to halt to catch her breath and compose herself before she opened the door and looked in upon him. He was alone and seemed asleep; at least his eyes were closed. Harriet stood an instant gazing at him.

His face was peaceful now but worn, and his paleness was more evident than when he had been talking to her father. As she stood watching him, she felt her blood coursing through her as never before and warming her face and her fingertips; and fear—fear of him or of herself, fear of anything at all in the world—fled from her; and love—love which she knew that she need no longer try to deny—possessed her.

"Harriet!" She heard her name from his lips and she saw, as he opened his eyes and turned to her, there was no surprise in his look; if he had been sleeping, he had been dreaming she was there; if awake, he had been thinking of her.

"What is it, Hugh?" She was beside him and he was looking up into her eyes.

"You meant it, then? All you said and—and all you did when we—you and I—were alone against them all! It's so, Harriet! You mean it!"

"And you did too! Dear, it was only to me that you could come back—only to me?"

"Only to you!" He closed his eyes in his exultation. "Oh, my dear, I never dreamed—Harriet in all the days and nights I've had to plan and wonder what might be for me if everything could come all right, I've never dreamed I could win a reward like this."

"Like this?"

He opened his eyes again and drew her down toward him. "Like you!"

She bent until her cheek touched his and his arms were about her. He felt her tears upon his face. "Not that; not that—you mustn't cry, dear," he begged. "Oh, Harriet, aren't you happy now?"

"That's why. Happy! I didn't know before there could be anything like this."

"Nor I. . . . No, it's all right, Harriet; everything is all right now?"

"All right? Oh, it's all right now, if I can make it so for you," she answered.

[THE END]

All aboard for the road making special that will leave the Summit corner, in several sections Tuesday morning for the Pilot Knob road. H. L. Taylor has designated next Tuesday as the most convenient day to cut the brush along the side of the county road west of the State Park and every man in town who can go should be ready to do his share of the work. If you cannot go, get someone in your place. If you cannot put in the whole of the day, then go either in the forenoon or after dinner. Even if you cannot get away until four o'clock, do not let that deter you from spending a couple of hours out there.

Our readers are conversant with the situation with reference to the county line road and the attitude of the Hancock county board, and also as to the previous attitude of the board of conservation with reference to building roads within the park. The Hancock county board does not want to do anything on the county line and the park board has indicated that roads leading to the park should be a better condition before inside roads are built. However, a letter has been received from the secretary of the park board asking as to the estimated costs of certain road work in the park. This indicates that, should we do our part in a small way at least, there is hope of getting some roads inside. We will at least have a showing to make to both boards that there was such a demand that volunteer work gave the project a forward movement.—Forest City Summit.

The Joy of Living

by Sidney Gowing

COPYRIGHT, 1922, BY SIDNEY GOWING

Speed, thrills, love and laughs! Here is youth personified and romance on wheels—actually on wheels, for next to the human actors the most important thing is a motorcycle. The hero is a young American from Colorado. The heroine is an English girl. Scenes are laid in England and bring to the reader's view many of the charms of a British countryside.

Suppose you were a stranger in a strange land and all unexpectedly were forced to assume the guardianship of a madcap young lady, a titled daughter of the country, with a perfect genius for getting into trouble, yet the merriest, nerviest and altogether loveliest little creature you had ever met; suppose that one of her innocent larks had caused her to be suspected of a burglary which drew not only the local police, but the terrifying detectives from Scotland Yard upon her trail; you knew her to be incapable of wrong-doing, and it were up to you to save her; what would you do? You would be likely to split your head thinking, wouldn't you? Well, Billy Spencer got his scalp cracked by one of the real burglars, but it did not prevent his thinking and acting—quickly, efficiently and with real American genius and daring.

Sidney Gowing is a comparatively new novelist whose cleverness has attracted international attention. He has great gifts as a humorist and delights in mixing American and British characters and extracting a great amount of fun from both. He seems to lack the fondness of the average English novelist for plots involving marital infidelities. His "The Joy of Living" is clean in every respect, combines comedy and thrilling adventures, lives up to its title and is an antidote to a jaded appetite.

CHAPTER I

Sentenced.

"I can't go, dad," said Aimee desperately, "and I won't!"

"My answer, my dear Aimee," said Lord Scroope firmly yet benignantly, "is that you must go, and you shall!"

"A month of Aunt Erythea," said Aimee in stifled tones, "would kill me. Why are these things always piled on to me? I'm fed up!"

The Very Rev. Viscount Scroope, archdeacon and incumbent of the living of Scroope Magna, gazed dreamily over his daughter's head without appearing to hear her. A sunbeam filtered through the diamond panes, illumining his silver hair and finely cut features. It was as though the sunbeam said: "Behold a saint; here is one who hears and speaks no evil." A saint Lord Scroope undoubtedly was; calm, benign and immovable as granite.

"My dear child," he said gently, "let us admit the cold light of reason. You can have no genuine objection to your Aunt Erythea, for you have never set eyes on her since you were three years old. Jervaulx abbey is a well-appointed and strictly ordered house. It is an atmosphere which will correct, I hope, the influence of that deplorable school from which we have removed you. You must go. Aunt Erythea desires that you shall go. And that, as you will realize when you make her acquaintance, is final."

The Hon. Aimee Scroope's vividly lovely face became still more mutinous and desperate.

"And do not suppose that you will lack youthful society," added Lord Scroope, smiling. "Your cousin, Alexander Lambe, is at Jervaulx. A little older than yourself, doubtless, but an excellent companion for you. A young man wholly devoted to good work, and with unexceptionable connections, he will doubtless attain that eminence which his aunt would wish for him."

Aimee looked at her father with intense suspicion. Then she turned to the photograph of a young man in a clerical collar; the face was pleasant but somewhat serious, with large, frank, round eyes. The face that Aimee made at it was hideous.

"Go and tell your maid to pack, dear child," said Lord Scroope gently, patting her head. Aimee was twenty years of age, and stood five feet six, but her father contrived to have the air of patting somebody about three feet high.

Aimee said something inarticulate, and made a bee-line for a rose-pink boudoir where Lady Scroope, blonde, petite and wholly charming, was buttoning her gloves. Amid pink surroundings, Lady Scroope looked little older than her daughter.

"Mummy," said Aimee forcibly, "you'll have to throw me a rope. I have simply got to be rescued from this awful visit!" She expounded with extreme rapidity and terror her views on Jervaulx, Lady Erythea Lambe, and Alexander.

Lady Scroope twinkled, and was so exasperating as to laugh. She put her hands affectionately on her daughter's shoulders.

"Sorry, Aimee," she said: "there is nothing doing. You will have to go. I can't have your dear father worried any more. I don't think," she added pensively, "there's any cause for real alarm about Alexander Lambe."

"It's all very well for you," mourned Aimee, "but—"

"I'm really sorry, dear. I am going to the Milne-Temples and elsewhere for a few weeks, but when I come back I will make it up to you. These are the little crosses you have to bear."

She kissed her daughter, and hurried down to the car.

The car whirled her away, and Lord Scroope followed it with dreamily adoring eyes. Aimee, who had watched the pair with a sort of exasperated affection, turned into the morning room.

"What on earth," she murmured, "is one to do with people like that?"

She encountered her guest and cousin, Georgina Berners, twenty-three, plump and placid, dressed in a style that suggested enforced economy. Miss Berners was looking wistful.

"Why, Georgie," said Aimee, encircling her ample waist, "have you the hump, too? Let's be miserable together."

"It has been lovely here at Scroope," sighed Georgina, "and you are such a dear. I've nothing to go back to but Uncle Joseph, who doesn't think about anything but biology, and scarcely remembers I exist—though he is quite kind, of course. It will be awful after this."

"I've never met your Uncle Joseph," said Aimee, "but I'm certain he's nothing to my Aunt Erythea and Jervaulx."

She broke into a frenzied and vivid word-picture of all that awaited her.

"A place something between a cathedral and a barrack, and a fearful sort of Roman matron with a nose like the duke of Wellington's—I've never seen aunt's nose, but it's certainly like that—and to be drilled into flirting decorously with an owl-faced curate who, some day, they say, will probably be a bishop—"

Georgina was intensely shocked.

"Aimee, you really are extraordinary! Many people would be too glad to be in your shoes. A long visit to a charming old place—Jervaulx, they say, is even more old-world than Scroope—everything orderly, romantic, peaceful—"

"Moldy!" interrupted Aimee.

"And luxurious. Lady Erythea, everyone says, is a splendid manager. And your cousin—a nice, sensible young man. I've seen his photograph. His face—"

"It's the face," said Aimee fiercely, "of a cold boiled codfish! I've seen it—I've seen it! It made me feel as if my shoes were full of water!"

"Aimee!" said Georgina plaintively. "You appal me!"

"Good thing! Then you know how I feel!" retorted Aimee pertly. "The whole thing appals me. These curates! I'm fed up with them! Alexander is the limit!"

Aimee paused for breath.

"He's a frump!" she said, with extraordinary vehemence.

"He is good!" insisted Georgina. "That is a good man's face, if ever I saw one. And," added Georgina, with a rapt expression on her plump features, "he will fall in love with you, Aimee. I'm sure of it! And when that happens—"

"Oh, you make me sick!" said the frenzied Aimee. "It's a disease with you! Sentiment revolts me. This maundering about love—"

"Aimee," said Georgina almost tearfully, "your very name means 'Beloved'!"

"Oh, rats!" said Aimee furiously, and fled from the room.

CHAPTER II

Escape.

In the deepest depression, Aimee wandered down the park avenue towards the high road. She passed through the lodge gates and turned the corner of the road.

There Aimee halted, and considered the perversity of Fate. And close beside her barked a sharp explosion, with a flash of yellow flame and a whiff of pungent smoke. And a clear voice exclaimed:

"H—l!"

"Just what I was thinking!" said Aimee.

A young man, who was tinkering a motorcycle, whence came the explosion, looked up startled, and removed his cap.

"Oh! I'm sorry!" he said. "I didn't know there was anyone around."

They looked at each other, and both laughed. It was impossible to look at the stranger and fail to laugh. Not in derision, but joyously, spontaneously, as one laughs when the breeze heels the boat, or when a puppy dog falls head over tail.

When the motorcyclist grinned, his teeth were so white that they gave the effect of a flash. His fair and rather tousled hair caught the sun. His head looked as if it might be rammed through a door, without damaging anything except the door-panel. He was big built, and about twenty-five, but his bright blue eyes might have belonged to a boy of sixteen. He wore dusty blue overalls.

"That's better!" he said approvingly, as Aimee laughed again. "You were looking as if you felt pretty low."

"I was. Everybody has been appalling! Talking sentiment till I feel sticky all over."

The stranger's face fell.

"Gee! That's too bad! Sentiment, eh?" He made a gesture as if warding off invisible assailants. "Sentiment is poison ivy! It gives me that tired feeling. Madam, accept my sympathy."

In the space of a moment they felt as though they had known each other for years.

"Do you live anywhere about here?" said Aimee. "I seem to have seen—"

"Here? About seven thousand miles west-by-south of here!" said the stranger, laughing. "Cobalt, Arapahoe county. Citizen of the world—answer to the name of 'Billy.' And

They Looked at Each Other and Both Laughed.

I'm here in England," he added, laying a loving hand on the tank of the motorcycle—"to sell this."

"Weird-looking thing!" said Aimee, with interest, for the cycle's engine was of a remarkable shape. "Yours?"

"Mine!" said the stranger joyously. "Alone I did it. I hold the patent. It's a Sanakatowzer—the Flying Sphinx!"

"Ripping name. Can it fly?"

"Can it fly? It devours space like the sunbeams lick up the mists of the mornin'! And no more noise than a baby's whisper.

"Around the world in thirty winks
When once astride the Flying Sphinx!

"It's got Sinbad's Carpet an' the Seven-league Boots guessing." He threw a leg over the saddle. "Like a spin up the road? Jump up behind!"

Aimee immediately perched herself on the carrier. There was a whirlwind charm about the stranger that carried her away. The next moment the Flying Sphinx did the same. The wind whistled past Aimee's ears. To keep her seat she was obliged to grab Billy suddenly round the waist.

"Don't mind if I hold you?" she gasped.

"Shucks!" said Billy impatiently. "I don't care how you hold me, s'long's you don't hit the grit!"

They breasted the crest of the rise.

"Hang tight now!" he cried. "We'll let her out!"

The Sphinx went forward with the whirr of a shell. She peeled the roadway behind her like a running tape. Aimee felt the roar of the wind rise to a scream. Billy leaned lightly forward towards the handle-bars, cool, effortless, efficient.

Aimee was only conscious of being whirled gloriously through space, when the Sphinx, after a two-mile loop, slid back to the spot whence she had started. Aimee sprang from the carrier.

"Oh, thank you!" she gasped. "That was too good to be true!"

The cyclist, without dismounting, looked at her glowing face and frank eyes.

"I wish there were more like you," he said, laughing. "Tell 'em—whoever they are—to can the sentiment. S'long, an' good luck to you!"

He raised his cap, and next moment the Sphinx whirred him away in a cloud of golden dust. Aimee followed him with her eyes till he was round the bend, then she turned back into the park. It seemed to her that the sunlight had become less vivid and the sky paler.

Very slowly, Aimee made her way back to the portals of Scroope Towers, where the heavy family car, laden with luggage, stood waiting. Georgina was on the steps, abundantly wrapped up, and Lord Scroope stood beside her.

"Grundle," he said to the chauffeur, "you will drop Miss Berners at the station and take Miss Aimee on to Jervaulx, returning here direct."

The chauffeur, who was a middle-aged man with a singularly wooden expression, seemed to be making a mental effort. He saluted, staring straight before him.

"Goodby, Georgina! Bless you, my child; bless you! Drive on, Grundle. What are you waiting for?"

The car meandered out of Scroope park and turned northward along the main road. Georgina was in low spirits. Aimee throughout had been seething with an enormously increased sense of mutiny, and, as they neared the station, she exploded.

"I can't stand it, Georgie!"

"I wish I were you!" said Georgina mournfully.

"Eh?"

"I wish I were Aimee Scroope, and on my way to Jervaulx abbey. That's all."

Aimee started slightly. An extraordinary impish expression came into her eyes. Georgina, who knew the sign of old, looked at her nervously.

"You are!" said Aimee, in a voice of unlooked-for decision.

"What on earth do you mean?"

Aimee gripped her by the arm, and replied, in a low voice that bubbled with excitement.

"My dear, fat cousin, your full name, as I remember, is Georgina Amy Scroope Berners! Lop off the superfluous head and tail, and there you are—Amy Scroope. Near enough for anyone. You are going to Jervaulx instead of me! Aunt Erythea has never seen me, nor has Alexander Lambe. And neither of them know you from Adam—I mean Eve! You'll suit them down to the ground!"

Georgina looked at her with dawning terror.

"It is a gorgeous arrangement!" exclaimed Aimee, tightening her grip on her cousin's arm. "And nothing easier. Uncle Joseph will never miss you—leave me to fix that up. Grundle will deliver you at Jervaulx; he's a perfect super-idiot, and has probably forgotten which of us is to go there, if we didn't tell him. He never talks, either. As for me, I shall go to Seabridge, or on a walking tour—or anything I choose!"

"Aimee, are you mad?"

"It is one of the sanest moments of my life!" retorted Aimee; and, leaning over the back, she tore the tag-labels off her luggage and Georgina's, and scattered them on the road. "You can take my things with you!"

"If you think for a moment I'd have anything to do with such a business—"

A fiendish expression came over Aimee's features. She gripped her cousin's arms again.

"If you don't," she hissed, "I'll tell everybody about you and Aloysius Blennerhasset getting lost at the rural-decanal picnic!"

At this monstrous accusation, Georgina blushed scarlet. The mildest peccadillo in a blameless life, the memory of the incident in question always filled her with alarm; Aimee had held it over her head before.

"I won't listen to another word!" she gasped.

"You needn't. It is the time for deeds!" Aimee seized a small square box from among the luggage and thumped the chauffeur on the back. "Grundle, stop here! I have only a bag, I'll walk up to the station approach. Take Miss Berners on to Jervaulx. And hurry—she is behind time already!"

A faintly bewildered expression passed over the chauffeur's face, as though he were trying to arrange his ideas. He rubbed his ear for a moment, then saluted and let in the clutch.

Georgina, who had risen with the intention of escaping from the car, lost her balance and collapsed in a slightly undignified manner on the seat.

She struggled up and turned a flushed face towards her cousin.

"Stop! Stop!" she cried, in an agonized voice. "Aimee—"

"Good-by, dear!" said Aimee, waving her handkerchief. "Don't get lost with Alexander!"

The car bore the speechless and gesticulating Georgina out of sight round the bend. Aimee sat down on her box, buried her face in her hands, and dissolved into such unfeeling laughter that a pair of thrushes and a chaffinch fled from the hedge in indignation and alarm.

* * * * * * *

Onward through the green lanes and over the county border the car carried a limp and nerveless Georgina. Consternation had given away to numb despair.

"What shall I do?" she thought. "What am I to say to Lady Erythea? There'll be a fearful row!"

Georgina racked her brains for a way out of the difficulty. There seemed to be none. She lay back exhausted. And so perverse is even the purest of human minds that a faint suggestion crept into Georgina's—a little whisper, as it were, in that blameless ear—that it would be peculiarly delightful if she could fill the role that Aimee had mapped out for her.

Georgina started, and thrust the idea from her with horrified self-reproach. Again she sought for an explanation—a true one—which would save Aimee's face. By the time she had considered and rejected half a dozen, finally deciding on one that she thought might do, the car had covered the thirty miles and was threading through the park road of Jervaulx.

Georgina stumbled out of the car at the main entrance and faced a gaunt and majestic lady in gray silk who came down the steps.

"And so, my dear Aimee," said Lady Erythea, in a large and informative voice, "you arrive at last. Welcome!"

Georgina faltered. Everything she had intended to say was driven out of her head. Aimee had been prophetic—Aunt Erythea was very like the duke of Wellington.

"Lady Erythea!" gasped Georgina, as two men-servants came to unload the luggage. "There is—there is a mistake! May I—"

"The modern tendency of the young to enunciate indistinctly," said Lady Erythea, producing an ear-trumpet, "always annoys me. Say what you have to say clearly."

Georgina had not realized that Lady Erythea was extremely deaf.

"There is something I have to explain," she bawled hoarsely into the ear-trumpet. "P-please, can I see you alone?"

"Ah!" said Lady Erythea vaguely. "I am pleased that you look forward so much to your visit. No, you need not fear being alone. Here is your cousin," she added, as a young man in clerical collar came out upon the steps. "Alexander, your cousin, Aimee."

Georgina turned a pale and timid face to the stranger. The Rev. and Hon. Alexander Lambe bowed.

Alexander was large and well, though somewhat loosely, built. Aimee's epithet, "owl-faced," was hardly fair. Certainly his clean-shaven face was a little serious, and his eyes large and round, but very kindly.

"Welcome to Jervaulx, Cousin Aimee," he said.

A sudden interest and sympathy quickened in the large eyes as they rested on Georgina's face. And the panic-stricken girl's fear died within her. Mr. Alexander Lambe looked so cool and protective and dependable.

"Escort your cousin to the morning room, Alexander," said Lady Erythea authoritatively, "and offer her refreshment after her drive."

They walked in together. And as they walked their backs seemed to suggest, in some subtle manner, that an understanding, a mutual sympathy, had dawned between them. Backs can be very expressive sometimes.

Lady Erythea regarded them with a look of commanding approval. She followed them majestically up the steps.

"This," proclaimed Lady Erythea's erect and overwhelming back, "is as I ordained it from the beginning."

CHAPTER III

Re-Enter Billy.

Aimee tramped along the broad highway, whistling. At Scroope, much more at Jervaulx, one was not allowed to whistle. Ever and anon she stopped whistling to laugh.

Aimee had dropped the square box into a quarry pit an hour before and continued on her way unburdened. The idea of finding lodgings at Seabridge appealed to her. She had funds enough. A month's pocket money was in her purse, and Lady Scroope had been liberal on her departure.

"What a row there'll be," chuckled Aimee, "if Georgie doesn't play up! I don't care. I gave them my ultimatum. They can't hang me. I've been very patient with them all. One must make a stand sometime or other. Who does my life belong to," demanded Aimee, never a purist in grammar, "if not to me?"

A faint sound was borne upon the breeze, a noise that attuned itself curiously to Aimee's thoughts. It was like the buzz of a homing bee. She looked up, and saw a motorcycle speeding along the road with a smear of following dust behind it like the tail of a comet. Aimee recognized the Flying Sphinx, and became aware of a laughing face looking up at hers, and a set of very white teeth.

"Why, it's Billy!" she cried spontaneously.

"Hello, old chap!" cried the cyclist.

Billy was bare-headed, his fair hair sticking up at the crown in a little tuft that blew about in the wind.

"Where were you making for?" he said.

"The unemployment bureau!" retorted Aimee flippantly.

Billy's face expressed concern.

"I suppose you're guying me. You don't mean you've lost your job?"

"Job!" Aimee bubbled with amusement. "Well, I had a job all ready for me this morning. But it's washed out. I've lost it. And now I'm adrift."

Billy was perplexed. He had been wholly unable to place Aimee. He wondered if she were a governess. A question was on his lips, but he checked himself for fear of giving offense.

"Lost it?" he exclaimed. "I guess it's just as well! You look a heap happier! What job d'you think of chasin'?"

"I—I don't know."

Billy looked at her eagerly. A sudden flash came into his eyes, as one who conceives a superb idea.

"Say! Let me find you one! I've a brain-wave!"

"What do you mean?"

"Go shares with me!"

"Shares?" echoed Aimee. She was conscious of a curious little thrill. "Share what?"

"See here!" said Billy, eyeing her keenly. "When we were doing fifty-five on the Sphinx, you never wilted—never turned a hair!"

"Of course not. It was gorgeous."

He came nearer, intensely earnest.

"Know anything about motor engines?" he said quickly.

"I've often taken down the old 'bus at home, on a wet day, and reassembled it."

"Where was that?"

"At the place where I had a job," said Aimee.

"Great!" he cried. "You're the thing I've been looking for all these months. Now, listen to the brain-wave. I'm over here to sell the Sphinx. There's a big deal on in London. But what I want's a quiet spot where I can develop some of the gadgets with no crooks around to steal 'em. Get me?"

"Yes, go on," said Aimee, catching his enthusiasm.

"I'm heading now for a little town called Stanhoe, thirty miles south of here. Stanhoe's quiet as the tomb. I've struck it before. There's an old mill I b'lieve I can get hold of, and fit up as a garage and workshop—"

"Yes, I see!" said Aimee eagerly.

"Come on into it with me—come to Stanhoe!" said Billy explosively. "You'll catch on to the Flying Sphinx in a minute, an' then popularize her as a lady's mount! The finest mount for a girl ever put on the market. There isn't one yet. You can do it! You've got the nerve—an' the grit! I'll teach you to tend an' drive her. Will you come?"

"Will a duck swim!" cried Aimee. "Of course I'll come!"

"Fine!—partner!" cried Billy, flinging out a big brown hand.

Aimee took it, and received a shake that bruised her fingers.

"Take your perch, old chap!" said Billy, straddling the Sphinx. "Off for Stanhoe!"

They whirred down the long slope with the westering sun broad on their right above the fir-trees. It was a roughish ride on the carrier. There was no pillion-seat; Billy was evidently not accustomed to carry passengers.

"Say," said Billy, over his shoulder, "I didn't catch your name, did I?"

"Aimee—Snooks," replied the passenger on the spur of the moment, as well as she could for the wind whistling in her teeth.

"Snooks!"

Aimee laughed. It was very like Scroope, and quiet as musical.

"Near enough!" she gasped. "But 'old chap' will do. Is that American?"

"American? Gee, no! It's the only English I know. Let it go at that—Amy is too feminine for a partnership. And now we'll let her out. This," said Billy joyously, as he opened the throttle wide, "is what the doctor ordered!"

The Flying Sphinx, freighted with the partners, roared down the hill and devoured the miles to Stanhoe.

* * * * * * *

On the outskirts of the little market town of Stanhoe was a cyclist's rest-house. Here the two travelers had tea under a laburnum tree on the lawn. Billy locked the amazing motorcycle in a shed, by the proprietor's leave, and the pair walked into the town on foot.

Two more utterly insouciant and care free young people never entered an English village on an April day. No jot of doubt, of fear, or hesitation assailed them. Billy, intensely masculine though he was, appeared to be possessed of a virgin mind. Such a thing, though uncommon, is by no means nonexistent among the sons of Adam. It may be that the air of the Colorado foothills favors its growth. His possession of it called for no comment from Aimee. Her mind was of the same color.

It did not enter into their heads for a moment that anybody could put a dubious construction on their association with each other. Had such an idea dawned, they might possibly have turned and parted company on the spot.

Aimee left Billy suddenly and addressed an inquiry to an elderly man who stood beside a farmer's cart. In a moment she rejoined him.

"Mrs. Sunning, 2 Ivy cottage, lets lodgings," announced Aimee triumphantly. "You don't mind lodgings, do you? Better than a hotel—more freedom."

"Freedom for mine!" said Billy. "Let's try it!"

Ivy cottage proved to be a pretty little Jacobean building fronting on a green lane just outside Stanhoe. An apple-cheeked woman, who was picking weeds out of the path, announced herself as Mrs. Sunning, and Billy at once stated his needs, offering to pay in advance.

A number of Belmond citizens were at Clarion the past week, off and on, attending court. The Moe case from Belmond, and the Waite cases from Rowan, were the chief attraction. Judgement was rendered in favor of Andrew Jorgenson against Lewis Moe in the sum of $394.10. The case was a dispute over some tiling. Lloyd Waite, one of the principals in the bootlegging case from Rowan, was found not guilty by the jury after 15 minutes deliberation. The charge against him was for carrying concealed weapons. Altho it seems to have been proved that Waite had a gun in the Rowan barbershop, and that in a spirit of bravado he pulled it and fired thru the floor, the jury voted not guilty. Ruth Knudson Wins Short Story Contest

Out of Thirty-Seven Entries In Story Contest Miss Knudson Wins The Prize.

"THE SUBSTITUTE GHOST."

Miss Ruth Knudson is the lucky winner of the Five Dollar Prize, offered by the Independent, for the best short story of 3,000 words or less written by a pupil of the Belmond schools.

Miss Knudson's story is entitled "The Substitute Ghost", and is very well handled. The judge of the stories, Mrs. Wm. Leonard, of Swaledale, said in part of Miss Knudson's story:

"Number seven seems superior to the others in plot and finished style. It evidently was written by someone who has gone over the material a great many times and made thoughtful corrections. Several of the others deserve honorable mention and I consider them exceptionally good, but lacking in final polish which would make them winners."

All stories submitted—37 in all—were handed to the Independent with numbers only on them, all names being taken off. They were sent to the judge this way, and not until Miss Thomas, of the school faculty, gave the name of the winning number was the author known.

"The Substitute Ghost" will be printed in the next issue of the Independent, and you are urged to read it. You will say that Belmond contains some budding literary talent which, if cultivated, should go far, and you will enjoy the story.

Miss Knudson will receive a check for the prize money upon publication of the story. The Independent is only sorry that there could not have been more than one winner, for many of the stories were really very good and a high credit to their authors. The Independent hopes next year to offer another chance to the literary talent of the Belmond schools.

Meanwhile, watch for "The Substitute Ghost" next week.

HAMPTON AFTER AUTO LAW VIOLATORS

The town of Hampton is going after the autoists who consistantly violate the traffic rules and regulations of the municipality. The auto parking marks on the business streets are being made, and a strict observance of these parking marks will be enforced. The fellows who, after a long winter of inactivity, entertain a desire to step on 'er, are warned to take it easy, and high or low, regardless, will be given an invitation to tell it to the judge. A few similar warnings might profitably be served in Belmond.

* Unbounded Faith in Ford Cars. *

* The following appeared a few days ago in the State Register of Springfield, Illinois:

* "Many are the stories of Henry Ford and his popular automobile but Hillsboro is relating what it calls the best of the season, and the facts in the case are true. It happened in one of the leading churches of the city that the pastor took for the text of his sermon, "Better Church Attendance."

* The pastor held that the automobile had taken more people away from church than any other thing. He concluded with the exclamation: "The Ford car has taken more people to hell than any other thing that I can mention!" Whereupon an old lady in the congregation began to clap her hands and moan, 'Praise the Lord! Praise the Lord!"

* "What's the matter, sister?" asked the pastor.

* "The Ford never went any place that it couldn't make the round trip, and I am sure that all these people in hell will be back,' she answered, 'so praise the Lord.'"

KILLED IN AUTO ACCIDENT

Fred Seeley, a young farmer residing near Bristow, was accidently killed last week while assisting to get a big automobile out of the mud. An auto party became stuck in some deep mud near his place and Seeley was engaged to pull them out with his team. The car had been pulled out of the mud hole, when Seeley stumbled and fell in front of the wheels, the team pulling the car on over him, breaking his neck. He was not immediately killed, and was rushed to a Waverly hospital, where he died Saturday night. He had been married a few months.

FARM HOME DESTROYED BY FIRE SUNDAY

Geo. Potts Home Burns To Ground With Loss Of Some Furniture And Clothing.

The George Potts farm home west of town was totally destroyed by fire Sunday afternoon. The fire, starting from a defective chimney, was first noticed about 4:30 in the afternoon, on the roof of the house. News of it was phoned to town and the alarm given. The fire company accompanied by many local citizens, went to the scene, but by that time the blaze was so far advaanced that the house could not be saved and all efforts were devoted towards saving the furniture and clothing. A large quantity was carried out, but quite a bit was destroyed. The loss on the furniture is covered by insurance it is understood, and the loss of the house, around $3,500, is partly covered.

Night Fire At Galt Ruins Half Block

Seven Business Buildings Are Destroyed—Very Little Is Saved From Any.

NO ESTIMATE ON LOSS

About half of the business section of Galt was destroyed by fire late Saturday night, seven buildings being burned. The loss in all cases with the exception of one, was practically total.

The fire, supposedly starting around 1:00 o'clock Sunday morning, seems to have originated at the rear of the Joe Blink Grocery and Meat Market. A Mrs. Johnson, residing just across the road west from the market, noticed the blaze when she returned from Dows. The fire was then only a small blaze. She immediately turned in the alarm, and a number of Galt citizens got their fire fighting apparatus, which consisted of buckets and a small fire chemical cart with two 50-gallon tanks. No one knew how to use the chemical apparatus, and by the time someone was found who could manipulate it, the fire was beyond control. Word was sent to surrounding towns for help and as there was no wind to speak of, the blaze was gotten under control after seven buildings were destroyed. The places burned were:

Louis Steenblock, hardware, 2-story building.

Joe Blink, grocery and meat market, 2-story building.

Post Office, with small line of groceries, Cal Howard proprietor, 2-story building.

Cobbler shop, "Deacon" Parsons proprietor, one story.

Bank of Galt, 1½ story building. The vault was uninjured and remains standing.

Cream station, run by A. P. Kellogg, one story.

Two warehouses or storage houses back of the hardware store, used as private garage and storehouses.

All the buildings with the exception of the hardware, and cream station, were owned by the Parsons estate; Dr. Potter owned the cream station, and had his office over the post office. The Steenblock hardware, the grocery and meat market, and post office were all in one big building, similar to the brick block in Belmond, and was frame with sheet iron covering. Other buildings were frame. They were all burned to ashes. Nothing much was saved from any of the business places except the hardware store, where a large part of the stock was carried out. All valuable papers in the bank were in the vault.

The Independent was unable to secure an estimate of the loss, or to find what insurance was carried. Property values in Galt of course would not be very high, compared to Belmond, but the loss in the post office, bank and stocks of the business houses will run into money and cannot be determined until a careful check is made. The town was over run with sightseers Sunday, from neighboring towns.

Senior Class Play Given Next Week

Many Fine Endorsements Are Given "Daddy Long-Legs" By New York Press.

ON NEXT FRIDAY NIGHT

The Senior Class play wll be given May 11. Tickets on sale at Schultz Drug Co. next week.

A matinee will be given for school children at one o'clock. Admission for cheldren 25 cents. Evening performance at 8:15. Reserved seats 50 cents.

Nearly everyone has read the book, "Daddy Long-Legs." Many have seen Mary Pickford in the moving picture. Plan on seeing this play in the speaking drama which is released for amateur production for the first time.

SYNOPSIS

"Daddy Long-Legs" tells the story of Judy, a pretty little drudge in a bleak New England orphanage. One day a visiting trustee becomes interested in Judy and decides to give her a chance. She does not know the name of her benefactor, but simply calls him Daddy Long-Legs and writes him letters brimming over with fun and affection. From the foundlings' home she goes to a fashionable school for girls and there develops the romance that constitutes much of the play's charm.

Last Friday the Home Economics classes under the direction of Miss Eva Brown visited the Belmond Furniture company in order to study the various types of furniture. Mr. Trafford, the manager has offered the choice of a pair of candle sticks or a pair of book-ends to the girl writing the best essay on "The Furnishing of the Home." The school appreciates this offer very much.

Friday afternoon the eighth grade and high school girls and the ladies on the faculty were invited by the Community Club to attend the lecture given by Mrs. Meyer. The lecture was very interesting and instructive. We wish to thank the Community Club for this opportunity.

The baseball team went to Garner last Friday, and beat the Garner boys 11 to 5. The game was much closer than the score indicates as the Belmond boys made five scores in the seventh inning. Nine innings were played.

Last Friday Division 2 of the Literary gave one of the best programs of the year. The little play "A Young Man's Fancy" showed lots of work and was very cleverly given. Division 1 is preparing the next program which will be given next week.

The Sheffield high school baseball team will be here Friday to meet our boys. This will be a good game, so plan to attend.

The Home track meet will be held Thursday after school. Monday we have a dual track meet with Clear Lake at the latter place.

The Annual is being printed and work on it is progressing fast.

SUGAR CAMPAIGN UNDER FULL SPEED AHEAD

Seed And Fertilizer Now Going To Farmers—More Acreage Being Signed.

The sugar factory campaign for 1923 is going forward rapidly, and the campaign this year bears every indication now of being the most successful that the factory has yet experienced.

Seed and fertilizer is now being sent out to the farmers, and work has been going on all week toward getting in the crop. Some seeding has already been done, and much more will be completed within the next week to ten days.

More acreage has been contracted for this year than was had last, and more is being signed up every day. It is expected that the total acreage for 1923 will be considerably larger than last year. The labor for the fields has been half filled now, and presents no difficult problem to be solved as has been the case before on occasions.

Supt. Adams is now in active charge at the factory and is looking the plant over preparatory to having it overhauled for the season. In a short time a force of mechanics will be on the job getting things in shape for the operating campaign.

The late spring has induced many farmers to plant beets this year, instead of small grain or corn as had been planned, and from present indications they are going to be glad of it when harvest time comes. With a fair chance beets this year should yield a fine return, and if such is the case the factory should operate at a very successful profit.

Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Luick were visitors at Des Moines a day or two last week.

Cap. Tyrrell Makes Another Fine Gift

Gives Beaumont Magnificant Public Library By Purchasing Church Ediface.

COST OF BUILDING $70,000

Wright county friends of Cap. W. C. Tyrrell, Sr., of Beaumont, Texas, will be interested in the latest Philanthropic gift he has made, that of a $70,000 public library to the city of Beaumont. The Beaumont Enterprise says of his gift, in part:

The fulfillment of the city's dream of a public library building has been made possible through the philanthropy of Capt. W. C. Tyrrell, capitalist and public spirited citizen who, it became known yesterday has agreed to purchase the handsome First Baptist church edifice and donate the building for library purposes to the people of Beaumont.

Captain Tyrrell's offer to purchase the church building at a price of $70,000 was accepted yesterday by the congregation of the First Baptist church in general conference.

According to the terms of the offer the property is to be deeded to the city of Beaumont within 30 days after it has been conveyed to Captain Tyrrell and will be known as the "Tyrrell public library."

Captain Tyrrell's generous offer was made several weeks ago following the decision on the part of the First Baptist church to raze its present building to make room for a new church property. His gift to the city, Captain Tyrrell explains, was prompted as much by his desire to save the edifice as through his recognition of the need for a public library.

The donation of a public library to the city will mark the culmination of a long desire on the part of Captain Tyrrell to render this public service.

"For a long time I have felt like I wanted to do something for the city of Beaumont," he said, "and knowing that a public library was needed so badly—I have heard so many nice ladies bemoaning the fact that we have no public library building—I saw my opportunity."

The property involved in the Tyrrell purchase consists of 90 front feet on Preal street and extends 146 feet along Forsythe street. Adjoining property fronting 30 feet on Preal street is to be acquired from the First Baptist church by the city of Beaumont according to a separate agreement.

HOLD FINE MEETING

The ladies of Iowa township met with Mrs. Edmund Haupt Friday afternoon, April 27th. Roll Call was responded to with "Kitchen Shortcuts." The topic for the afternoon was "Poultry." County Agent Edwards gave a talk on "Poultry Production and Management" and Mrs. Lyle Hall talked on the "Care and Feeding of Baby Chicks and Mature Fowls."

Mrs. Jack Munnis, local leader for District No. 4 furnished a musical contest for social diversion which was very entertaining.

The May meeting will be held at the home of Mrs. A. C. Lieuwen. This will be an all day meeting and the time will be spent in the making of dress forms.

HUMBOLDT SERIOUS ABOUT OIL

The citizens of Humboldt are really serious about the oil fields underlying their community, and propose to see just what there is under the dirt over there. For some time seepage of oil has been found in that neighborhood, and considerable interest has been stirred up over it. So much so, in fact, that $15,000 has been subscribed by citizens there to drill a well. The main "oil field" is said to be on a farm near town, and the proposition is to buy this farm for $30,000—100 acres—and then sink a well for a test. The whole affair is a local one, and is being financed by those who are willing to "take a sporting chance" to lose.

THE SUN SHINES AGAIN

The financial sun is shining again. The clouds have been dispelled by the indomitable will power and determination of the American people, and the outlook is brighter than it has ever been at any time since the close of the great war. A survey of the situation throughout the country shows that business in nearly all lines is not only "picking up," but is actually assuming the proportions of a boom.

Building construction is on the up grade to such an extent that skilled labor is becoming scarce and difficult to obtain. Employment is waiting for every man who possesses any skill at all in the various trades, and the ranks of the unemployed are becoming so decimated that it is almost a case of the job hunting the man.

Wages in numerous cases have been voluntarily raised instead of lowered, and this has operated to allay the spirit of unrest that has existed among the laboring classes for years.

The indications are that farm help will also be scarce this summer, owing to the fact that idle men will be comparatively few. The farmer, however, is preparing to overcome this handicap by taking greater advantage of the latest improvements in farm machinery.

Altogether the outlook is very bright. It is difficult indeed to obscure the financial sun in this country for any length of time.

Firestone

Will Not Increase Prices on Solid and Pneumatic Truck Tires Until May 1st

Never has Firestone been so well situated to give operators the greatest measure of Cushion, Traction and Mileage at the lowest cost.

Today, economical manufacturing and distribution are showing the fullest results. Our favorable purchases of rubber, in advance of the 150% increase brought about by the British Crude Rubber Restriction Act, aid further in maintaining the old price levels.

Whatever the Truck Service—the Firestone Dealer Has the Right Tire

Firestone developments of the past two years have made pace for the industry and set new records in sure, economical performance. Five tires—the Heavy Duty Cushion, the Truck Type Cord, the Maxi-Cushion, the Giant Solid and the High Type—cover the needs of motor haulage in all its forms. Each has a distinct work which it does best. Each possesses a definite and special value for the operator.

Truck owners, using pneumatic tires, will find the answer to every demand of rapid, economical transportation in the Firestone Truck Type Cords with the tread that increases carrying capacity and improves traction, and the powerful gum-dipped carcass construction.

Let the Firestone Service Dealers Keep Your Trucks Moving

There are 800 Firestone Service Dealers, located in the principal trucking centers, fitted by natural ability and a thorough knowledge of trucking, to help you choose the right tire for your roads, loads and service.

Price Protection as Long as Stocks Last

Additional tires will be supplied to Service Dealers only so far as our present output will permit. Consult the nearest Firestone Service Dealer at once regarding your truck tire needs. He is in an advantageous position to give you an unusual tire—a specialized service—and prices which may not be duplicated in months.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Booster Farm Bureau Edition

The booster farm bureau edition which has been planned for sometime during the latter part of May is gaining momentum by rapid strides. The interest in the big story about Wright county and its resources seems to be gaining rapidly and all farmers of Wright county realize the importance of advertising the agricultural interests of our progressive county.

In gathering material for this special farm bureau edition all farmers, pure bred stock breeders, poultry breeders, special grain farmers, dairymen, and all organizations such as farmers' cooperative elevators, shipping association, cow testing associations, creameries, poultry associations and all other individuals and organizations having a direct or an indirect relation with the agricultural interests of our county are invited to contribute stories about Wright county agriculture. An effort is being made to get stories from these individuals and organizations relative to the purebred livestock, farm crops and cooperative enterprises in our county. This is an exceptional opportunity to have every person and every organization which is interested in the community in which we live, to boost for Wright county, the best county in the state of Iowa.

Boone Enjoys Social

Farmers of the Boone township farm bureau held a special meeting at the center school last Thursday evening, April 26th, when about 150 farmers, their wives and families packed themselves into the country school building for this community and social gathering.

Q. M. Lee, director of the Boone township bureau was in charge of the meeting. An interesting school program which was planned and organized by the rural teachers of the township was given in connection with this meeting. The success of the meeting was due in a large measure to the efforts of the rural teachers of that community. The school program consisted of recitations, dialogs, and several musical numbers.

The principal address of the evening was given by R. E. Lee Aldrich of Iowa township. Mr. Aldrich told in an interesting fashion, bits of the early history of the county and of his first impression of the Luni district when he was a boy. Mr. Aldrich has always been a firm believer in farmers' organizations and has given his time to the farm bureau on many occasions in talking organization and community cooperation to the farmers of our county. His address at the Boone township farm bureau meeting was interesting and inspiring and those who had the pleasure of hearing him are more firmly convinced than ever before that organization and community cooperation are two of the factors that must prevail in an agricultural community if the farmers are to receive reasonable returns from their labor and livestock most contentedly in the community.

The Seed Corn Situation

The county wide seed corn survey which was conducted by the county agent has just been completed and the results on the germination test seems to indicate that the seed corn of Wright county has not as high a germination percentage as it should have to insure a good stand of corn this year.

About 160 samples of 100 kernels each were collected from the various townships of the county and a very careful test was made of the germination qualities of the corn. The average for the county wide germination test shows that there are 87 per cent of the kernels strong, 7 per cent weak, and 6 per cent dead. The lowest test which has been made shows 64 per cent and the highest test 99 per cent.

The results of this county wide survey of the seed corn situation seems to indicate that a great many of the farmers ought to be careful in their selection of their seed corn for planting this year. As was stated in the county papers a short time ago a large per cent of the seed corn of the state is affected the so-called dry rot mold. We cannot over-estimate the importance of the farmer making an individaul ear test of his corn if there is any doubt in his mind as to the strong vituality and high germination qualities. Each farmer who contributed a sample of seed corn to the county agent will receive a report on his individual test.

Organize Junior Livestock Judging

The Junior Livestock Judging club of Wright county will begin its work next Saturday afternoon at 2:30 when the boys and girls of the county who are interested in the livestock judging work will meet in the county agent's office and go over plans for the organizing of the Junior Livestock Judging club for the 1923 season.

All boys and girls of Wright county who are interested in joining the livestock judging club and who are anxious to learn the important points in judging different classes of livestock are urged to be present at this meeting next Saturday. The county agent will outline the plan of the judging work for the 1923 season and a tentative schedule will be laid out for the judging tour that will be made this year.

It will be remembered that the Wright county boys won first place at the Livestock Judging contest in Des Moines last year and it is hoped that the boys and girls of the county will take enough interest in the work so that we may send a winning team to the state fair again this year. It might be added that this judging work is not limited to the boys and that last year some of the best judges in the state and inter-state fairs happened to be girls.

Iowa Farm Bureau Ladies Meet

The ladies of Iowa township farm bureau met at the home of Eddie Haupt last Friday afternoon for a social and business meeting About twelve ladies of the community were present and took part in the discussion.

Mrs. A. C. Lieuwen, vice-director of Iowa township farm bureau planned this meeting with the idea of getting the ladies of her township together for a discussion of problems common in interest to the entire community. These ladies had a very interesting discussion on poultry production, every lady being assigned a particular subject bearing on the poultry work. The county agent gave a short talk on poultry production and gave out a number of valuable bulletins on poultry work.

Grant Social at Wig Home

The K Wig home six miles northeast of Clarion was the scene of a lively community social last Friday evening, April 27, 1923 when the postponed meeting of Grant township farm bureau was held at that cozy farm home. No township lines were drawn at all in inviting the guests and people from neighboring townships were in attendance.

An interesting program consisting of recitations, dialogues and songs by the local school also special musical numbers by local talent were given. Rev. Harold Tompkinson of the Congregational church at Clarion was the principal speaker of the occasion. He spoke on the interesting subject of "What is Wrong with the World" and incidentally mentioned some of the problems of the farmer today. The one thought which he seemed anxious for his listeners to take home with them is that if farmers are to receive a reasonable return for their labor they must organize and cooperate with each other.

The farmers of Grant township have always been firm believers in the social community life and with very few exceptions they have succeeded in holding regular monthly meetings for the discussion of problems which are of vital interest to their community and for a social good time. Due credit should be given to Miss Violet Lukens, the local teacher, who cooperated with Mrs. Harry Woodley and Alf Huntley in planning and organizing this community social. Let us hope that this spirit of community cooperation and helpfulness will continue in Grant township as well as in every other township of the county.

Ted Townsan returned last Saturday night from his trip to Minnesota, where he drove last week with Chas. Reese to look after some building operations on the latter's farm. Mr. Reese did not return, going on farther on business affairs.

EVERYONE SHOULD PLAY

"Are you too old to play? If you are, then you are ready to die," says Miss Jessie Shannon of the department of physical education at Iowa State College.

Play is an instinct not of childhood, but of the human race, Miss Shannon declares, and goes ahead to explain how the grownups need their play hour just the same as do the kids. "The tired business man who objects to walking two blocks in town," she says, "will chase a golf ball the same number of miles over hills and hollows with the same enthusiasm that a baby shakes a rattle. It is the play instinct that accounts for both. If this instinct is a natural one, then it should not be lost as long as life lasts."

Miss Shannon says that a ladies' aid society has as much right to a basket ball team as a club of high school girls, and will get as much out of it. Business men and laborers need base ball teams as much as their sons do.

"Everyone admits," she says, "the social, moral and physical values of play for the child in creating fairness, unselfishness, loyalty and numerous other qualities in addition to good health. Play has these same values for people of any age. If you are ready to drop out of the game, a part of you is ready to drop into the grave, and you are losing the best possible medium for mental relaxation and physical exercise which more than anything else produces a congenial disposition and good health."

We are still taking orders for field seeds and can now furnish almost any grade you wish. And when speaking of seeds—have you seen our line of garden seeds in bulk and packages, onion sets and all lawn seeds?

Your Good Will Be Our Gain

sell costs us more than many twines we could buy, and even at the small profit we make, it may cost you just a little more than you might have to pay for a poor twine. But you must remember that the COST of twine to you is NOT what you pay for it, but what you get from it. Scattered grain, caused by weak, uneven twine which breaks or fails to knot, pays no profit. That's why we prefer to sell you good twine, guaranteed for length, strength and weight. You are safeguarded against shortage, poor tying and breakage when you use the good reliable "Big Ball" Deering Twine. Give us your order the next time you're in town.

Prices always right at our store.

Planter Profits!

Your soil may be rich, your seed bed in A-I shape, the weather favorable and your seed of the very best, yet you are likely to have a poor stand unless your planter puts every hill in its place and makes every hill a full hill. Before you can get planter profits you must have a planter you can absolutely depend on. The International No. 8 is such a planter. It is designed and built with just one end in view—to drop accurately and to check evenly—to place every hill where it belongs and to make every hill a full one. Accuracy—that's it—and it spells planter profits for you. Buy and use an International No. 8 Corn Planter this year. We sell 'em.

COURT HOUSE OFFICIALS CAPTURE $25 REWARD

Webster City News—There was considerable excitement at the court house this morning when it was realized by County Clerk W H. Cunningham that a German Police dog, for which a standing reward of $25 has been offered for some three weeks, was playing about on the court house lawn. Every newspaper in the state has carried a reward of $25 for information leading to the return of a female German Police dog, answering to the name of Gretchen, strayed away from the fine kennels of Mrs. Ruth Reeve-Keefe, at Waucome Kennels, just east of Hampton, three weeks ago.

Mr. Cunningham, aided by his deputy Miss Fanny Baxter and both Sheriff Carl and his deputy Chas. Blair, all pussy-footed around the dog-aristocrat and the latter, who was advertised to be very fond of ladies and children, was easily captured by Miss Baxter. Mr. Cunningham at once telephone the Waucome Kennels and Mr. Keefe drove over at once and paid the reward.

The court house officials are consequently celebrating. The dog has a real history. She is a half-sister of "Strongheart" of movie fame, and the father of both was Kriminalpolizi-Dusternbrook. She has several pups that are three months old and is herself, two years old. The dog is one of the finest in this section and news of her loss was radio-graphed from Davenport almost immediately. The long distance telephone at the farm has been kept warm with calls from persons who thought they had seen the dog, but no actual trace of her was found until Sunday when she was seen at Belmond. Mr. Keefe drove over 100 miles on Sunday trying to locate the valuable animal.

The Waucome Kennels at Homestead Farm now have 14 valuable German Police dogs and the supply is never equal to the demand, Mr. Keefe says. The poor animal is footsore and weary and thin. She has travelled many weary miles on her search for home and was evidently making for home when she reached this city. She was lost while out hunting with other dogs after rabbits. She struck the graveled highway leading north thru Hampton and thinking she was on the home road, evidently traveled north as far as Mason City then west and was swinging about in a circle to reach home when she was seen here.

While visiting at the place of his birth, two years ago, he joined the Methodist church and has been as active a member as health would permit in all its orgaizations, until death released him from his sufferings. South of town near the Carr farm residence, in Wright county, is a half mile or so of road that is in terrible condition and has been for some time. One or more cars get stuck there almost every day. In talking to a traveling salesman this morning he imformed us the worst part of the drive from Britt was on north Main street of Kanawha.—Reporter.

"JAP" JOHNSON WRITES OF JAPANESE CUSTOMS

Nagasaki, Japan
March 27, 1923

I just got back last Saturday from a ten days' trip to the Lui Kui Islands, and I found it was a very interesting place to visit.

The Lui Kui Island lie in a chain from the southern part of Japan proper to the Island of Formosa. There are a great many of them, but we visited only two of the larger ones, the principle city of the first being Oshima, and the capitol of the second being Naha. These Islands are very peculiar in their physical fomation, being composed mostly of volcanic soil, with a mixture of coral rocks. Around the city of Naha on most any of the roads you can pick up pieces of coral, not the pink variety that is so often used for decorations, but a white branch variety, and also a specie that is called brain coral, due to its structure resembling the brain of a human being. There are a lot of active volcanoes on the smaller islands, and as we were coming back I saw one of them in the act of erupting large volumes of smoke from its cone shaped crater. We were not near enough to hear any of the noises that it was undoubtedly making, but with a pair of glasses the smoke and the steam was very plain. For the most part the Islands are very low, with a few exceptions in those that compose the northern part of the chain, but in Okinawa, the name of the Island upon which we spent the most of our time, I do not think that any of the peaks reach an altitude of more than eight hundred feet.

The people that inhabit the Islands are somewhat similar to the Japanese and the Chinese, but they have some features that are different, the bridge of the nose is higher, and the face is somewhat fuller than either of the two races that they resemble. But they have the straight dark hair and the brown eyes that characterize the people of the Orient, and in their dress they resemble the Japanese, as both the men and women wear Kimonos. In stature they are about the same as the Japanese, being somewhat shorter on the average than the races of the western world. But they are kind and very good natured; all the time that we were there we at no time suffered from any conduct on the part of the natives. To be sure we were looked upon as rather strange creatures, and every place that we went the children set up the hushed cry of "Saogin", which is the word for foreigners, and followed us at a safe distance. Some times when we got tired of their company we turned around and ran at them, and such a scattering as it would cause in the ranks was sure funny to see. But I guess that you cannot blame them, as we were the first they had ever seen.

Some of the customs of the island are very peculiar, the most noticeable being the habit that the older women had of having their hands tatooed with very strange designs. However, this custom has been prohibited by law, so that the only ones you see with the tatoo marks are the older women. It is said that the custom originated when a Japanese officer was going to take a Lui Kui woman to Japan against her wishes, and to avoid going, she tatooed her hands, and made the officer think that she had contracted some skin disease, which frightened the officer so badly that he left her. Then the custom grew until all the Lui Kui women adopted it. When they were young they had a couple of spots tatooed on their fingers, and when they became married more was added, so that the place of the women's home could be told by the tatoo marks, as each province had some different mark that they used. We got one of the old ladies to hold her hands up in front of her so that we could take her picture; she was very nice about it, and as soon as we get them developed we are going to send her one of them.

I had heard before I left on the trip that one of the interesting things to see in the islands was the method that they used in burying the dead. At first I did not see how that was going to be of any great interest to us, but when I got there I think that about the first thing that attracted my attention was the large tombs they build for the dead. They are built usually on that side of hill and are great horseshoe shaped affairs, some of them twenty feet or more across. They are made out of stone, and some of them are very highly decorated with carvings. The body of the dead person is taken and placed in the tomb amid a great deal of ceremony and wailing; it is said that they have professional mourners whom they hire to go along to the tomb with the dead body, to make a great wail of anguish. The body is left in the sealed tomb for a year or more and then amid another ceremony the tomb is opened up, the bones of the person are washed off, and then placed in highly decorated urns which are set in the back of the tomb. If the tomb happens to be opened and the body is not entirely decomposed, it is supposed to be a sign that the person led a very bad life and is suffering for it, so when a very noted person used to die, as the old Lui Kui kings, the tomb was not opened for from three to ten years, so that they would be sure that they would not have to mourn for the suffering monarch. These tombs are the highest prized possession of the Lui Kui people; a man may not have more than ten yen in actual money, but he may have a tomb that is worth several hundred yen. If a family becomes hard up financially they can borrow money, giving posession of the tomb as security, and it is good security, because the people so highly prize these burial houses, that they will do all in their power to raise enough to pay off the debt. I am not sure what religion the people have, but it seems to be a sort of a combination of Buddism and family worship. One of the things that I noticed was the lack of priests in the places that we visited; here in Japan you see them every day, some of them in their flowing black robes and others of the begging variety in white clothes and large white hats, going from door to door, singing songs, for the few sens that they nearly always receive from the immates of the house.

The main lines of work of the people are raising sugar cane and rice, and the manufacture of cloth and straw hats, the latter a sort of panama which seems to be of a very good quality. Practically all of the farm work is done by hand, though some of them have oxen and horses that they use for plowing, if such it could be called, but most of the work is done by hand with the most crude of implements.

COLLEGE SERVES MANY

A total of 1,654 farmers, farm wives, boys and girls have attended agricultural short courses of one kind or another at Iowa State College during the past winter, according to information given out by the college recently.

According to the figures compiled 1,056 farmers, 170 club girls and 139 club boys were registered for the regular farmers' short course held from January 29th to February 3rd. In addition to these, it is estimated that fully 200 failed to register and therefore were not included in the count. Dispite a snow storm and inclement weather at the time, 132 Iowa women attended the homemakers' week given for women. One hundred twenty-seven butter and ice cream makers, together with 25 field representatives of dairy companies, attended the dairymen's short course.

These figures include only the attendance at the agricultural short courses. Conventions and short courses in other lines are also held from time to time.

The Joy of Living

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Disliking the prospect of a month's visit to her austere aunt, Lady Erythea Lambe, at Jervaulx abbey, and her cousin, Alexander Lambe, Aimee, vivacious daughter of the Very Reverend Viscount Scroope, is in a rebellious mood.

CHAPTER II.—She wanders into the park, there encountering a strange youth in trouble with a motorcycle. He laughingly introduces himself as "Billy," American. The two cement the acquaintance by a ride on the motorcycle, the "Flying Sphinx," and part. With Georgina Berners, her cousin, Aimee sets out for Jervaulx. On the way she decides that Georgina shall impersonate her at Jervaulx, while she goes on a holiday. Georgina's horrified protest is unavailing.

CHAPTER III.—Happy in her new freedom, Aimee again meets "Billy." He tells her his name is Spencer, and she gives hers as Amy Snooks, at present "out of a job." Billy offers to take her into partnership in selling the Sphinx. In a spirit of madcap adventure, she accepts. The two proceed to the town of Stanhoe, taking separate lodgings in Ivy cottage.

"Why, yes, sir," she said, smiling, with a civil bob to Aimee. "I've a nice sitting room and a li'll bedroom; Mrs. Dale, next door, has another, if you can do with that?" Mrs. Dale appeared, and confirmed the offer. Both of them looked at the pair with smiling interest and wonder.

"Great!" said Billy. "You take the room here, old chap, and I'll take the other. We'll share the parlor."

Aimee accompanied Mrs. Sunning indoors; the little parlor was clean and cozy, the bedroom, upstairs at the back, tiny but clean.

Aimee made her toilet, descended to the parlor and ordered a meal. Mrs. Sunning acquiesced in everything.

"He's a wunnerful pleasant gentleman, Mr. Spencer," she remarked, and then, hesitating and reddening, she looked at Aimee. "I—I suppose, miss," she said with much embarrassment, "it's all right?"

Aimee stared.

"All right? How?" she said. "Everything's all right. Very much so!"

The woman's eyes betokened belief—and relief.

"Bless your pretty face, who'd think anything else?" she said. "You'll excuse my askin', miss. You see, Lady Erythea is my landlord, and she owns all Stanhoe."

Aimee felt a galvanic shock.

"Whom did you say?" she asked dazedly.

"Lady Erythea Lambe of Jervaulx abbey, the big place half a mile south the cross roads. She fare wunnerful strict, she do. It's as much as my tenancy's worth to have any goings-on here. That's all."

The woman left the room. Aimee stared round her blankly, then collapsed into a chair. She flung her arms across the table, buried her head in them, and broke into paroxysms of impish laughter.

"Oh, my Christian aunt!" she sobbed. "My Georgie! My Alexander!"

Her shoulders were still shaking wildly when Billy came in.

"Say, what's wrong?" he exclaimed in alarm, as Aimee raised a tear-stained face. "Crying—eh? No, laughing! That's good! That's the cure for sentiment! But what's the joke?"

"Just something I thought of, that's all," said Aimee, wiping her eyes.

"That's all right," said Billy imperturbably. "Guess I ain't inquisitive. But folks mostly tell me their troubles sooner or later."

"I suppose they do," said Aimee, regarding him thoughtfully.

Mrs. Sunning brought an abundant meal; chiefly eggs and tea. Aimee found it the merriest feast she had ever sat down to. Finally, she accompanied Billy to Mrs. Dale's door, and, returning, retired to her own room. She was about to let down her hair, but desisted, and instead sat on the bed for some time, thinking. She heard Mrs. Sunning retire, and presently silence reigned throughout the house.

A curious sense of loneliness crept over Aimee's spirit. She remained sitting for nearly half an hour. Presently she blew out the candle, and leaned out of the open window. The window of Billy's room at the other end of the building was in darkness. It had not taken Billy long to retire.

Aimee stayed awhile at the window. She returned to the bed, and reflected again. In that reverie a vision floated before her as of trees and sunlight, and her partner's yellow hair flickering in the breeze.

"Billy!" she murmured thoughtfully. "Old chap!"

She laughed gently.

"He isn't a frump, anyhow!"

The reverie took shape. Then, with a little sigh, she slipped off her shoes, and, carrying them with her, stole very softly down the staircase to the front door. On trying the door cautiously, she found it bolted, and the latch immovable. Also no key was visible. She realized she was locked in the house.

A feeling of intense annoyance seized Aimee. Where was the freedom she had sought? She returned to her bedroom, put on her shoes, leaned out of the window, and inspected the wall critically. It was covered with ivy and trellis-work.

She swung herself cautiously out onto the sill, and began very quietly to descend the trellis. Aimee, active and long-limbed, could climb like a cat. And as noiselessly as any member of that great feline tribe, she dropped upon the soft soil of the garden plot.

CHAPTER IV

In Deep.

Georgina Berners paced the floor of her bedroom at Jervaulx abbey, and wondered why the universe had not crashed in ruins about her head.

"It's like a dream," she said dazedly, "I can't believe in it at all."

To Georgina it came as an incredible climax that she had, after five hours at Jervaulx, been dismissed to bed with an august but approving kiss from Lady Erythea, and a protective, cousinly hand-shake from the sedate Alexander Lambe. She had not been denounced as an impostor, flung out with ignominy, or handed over to the police. All these things had seemed to Georgina not only possible but likely.

"What on earth will happen when they find out?" she said, shivering.

She commenced to disrobe, but had not proceeded very far when a hustle and a click were heard. Georgina turned with a gasp of fright. Someone was trying to force a way in at her window. She caught sight of a flushed face.

With a shriek of terror Georgina retreated to the bed, and prepared to dive under it.

"Don't make such a row, you fool!" hissed a voice.

The casements swung inwards, and Aimee, rather breathless, dropped onto the floor.

"Handy things, these verandas," panted Aimee. "How are you, Georgina, old thing?"

Georgina stared at her in paralyzed amazement.

Aimee sat down beside Georgina on the bed, and put an arm around her waist.

"Well, what's happened here?" she said cheerfully.

"Oh, I am so glad to see you!" exclaimed Georgina with infinite thankfulness. "Now we can clear everything up. It's been awful!"

"Why? Have you given me away?" said Aimee quickly.

"I haven't! You know I wouldn't!" cried Georgina hotly. "Though you ought to be whipped. I never said a word about you, and that's why I'm in this awful mess!"

"Dear old Georgina! You're a brick!" said Aimee, hugging her. "I was only pulling your leg—I knew you wouldn't sneak. But why is it awful? Have they found out?"

"When I got here," said Georgina feebly, "I thought I could explain somehow. But Lady Erythea met me on the steps and took me for you, and everything went right out of my head—"

"Good! I see. You hesitated and were saved."

"Saved?" ejaculated Georgina angrily.

"Well, I was saved. That's more important. You haven't done anything wrong, my snow-white lamb. What then?"

"And then Mr. Lambe came out, and she introduced him as my cousin Alexander. And—and I've been frightened to death all the afternoon, for I haven't had a chance to put things right."

Aimee sat back and looked at her in awestruck admiration.

"You mean to say they've no suspicion at all?" she exclaimed. "Dear old Georgie, how deep you must have been. I never thought you had it in you!"

"I didn't—I wasn't!" said Georgina in almost tearful indignation. "I've hardly said a word all day, except 'yes' and 'no.' And not even that if I could help it."

Aimee gurgled.

"And a jolly safe line, too! I can see we've always underrated you, Georgie. And you mean to say they never even got an inkling, all through, that there was anything unusual? That does rather beat me."

"There were one or two little things that puzzled them for a moment, I think," said Georgina reflectively, "but it all seemed to smooth itself out. And oh!" she concluded, with a great gasp of relief, "I am so glad it's over and we can stop it. Now, how are we going to clear things up and make it all right for you?"

"Stop it? I wouldn't stop it for a kingdom. It's perfectly splendid!"

Georgina stood up.

"You are out of your senses," she said dazedly; "I won't listen to another word! Think how fearful it would be if Alex—if Mr. Lambe knew. He—"

"Aha—Alexander! Yes. Is he as owlish as his photograph? What did you say to him, Georgina?"

"I—I—hardly anything. He told me all about his missionary work in Manchuria. He—"

"Where was that?"

"In the rose garden—" Georgina broke off suddenly.

"Did he squeeze your hand?"

Georgina was speechless with indignation.

"You were thinking about him when you stood at the window!" said Aimee, with the air of a prosecuting counsel. "You were being sentimental. I saw your face. It had that gooey look."

"Aimee," said Georgina, fairly roused at last, "how dare you! I am going straight to Lady Erythea, and you can talk to her! I have done—"

"No, no! I'm sorry, Georgie," said Aimee soothingly. "I couldn't help pulling your serene leg. I won't say a word against your cousin Alexander."

"He is a gentleman, at any rate," said Georgina, rather spitefully "he is a person one can respect."

"I am sure he is."

"Well, what are we going to do?"

"The thing for you to do," said Aimee, "is to go on respecting Alexander. And for him to go on respecting you. Think how awful it would be if it came out now. Alexander," said Aimee, with a pathetic little break in her voice, "is good. He doesn't get into scrapes. He isn't in horrible trouble like me—and nobody to help me. I didn't think," she added with a gulp, "that you'd go back on me, Georgie!"

"I won't and I can't," said Georgina mournfully, "and you know it." But she softened visibly. "You haven't told me where you've come from, and what you've been doing! I've been frightfully worried about you."

Aimee regarded her thoughtfully. It was clear that Georgina already had all she could bear. This was no time to tell her about Billy.

"You needn't worry about me. I'm staying at a little place nearby. I'm quite all right, and I've got some money. We simply must keep it up for a few days—father is leaving Scroope Towers soon, and then I'll show you how we can smooth it all over."

"But don't you see how impossible it is! Your father will come here to see you before he goes. And he—he'll expect you to write to him!"

"How bright you are tonight, Georgie. You think of everything," said Aimee briskly. She sat down at the writing table by the wall, selected a sheet of the Jervaulx note-paper with the Lambe arms—three fleeces argent on a field vert—and with an immensely serious face began to write rapidly, pausing occasionally for thought. Georgina watched in fascinated horror.

"Listen!" said Aimee, blotting the sheet and reading it aloud with much satisfaction.

My Dearest Daddy: I arrived here safely, and already I'm quite one of the family. Aunt Erythea likes me much better than she thought she would; she is very nice and kind, and I have a lovely bedroom. I am enjoying myself very much at Jervaulx. (That's all perfectly true.)

Cousin Alexander is awfully interesting, and I like hearing him talk about Manchuria. He is a gentleman, and one feels he is really good, and that makes me respect him.

I'm awfully sorry I made such a fuss about coming here, but I never thought I should have such a lovely time as I'm having. So you needn't worry about me, because I'm going to be quite happy.

Your loving daughter,

AIMEE.

P. S.—In case you thought of coming over to see me soon, I ought to mention that the whole place is simply devastated with mumps. Of course it's quite all right for me, because I've had them.

Georgina emitted a moan.

"A very proper letter," said Aimee, affixing a stamp to the envelope, with a determined thump. "One should always, consider one's parents, and spare them pain. And that postscript is a touch of genius; the only thing in the universe Dad is afraid of is mumps. He hasn't had them, and he says they are a formidable affliction to the aged, and very undignified. And it's quite true; I saw five children at Stanhoe with mumps this afternoon. I should hate to tell a fib. Unless," she added, wrinkling her smooth brow, "it became absolutely necessary."

She moved toward the window.

"Aimee!" cried Georgina, starting up panic-stricken. "You're not going! Are you serious about this?"

"Not a bit. And don't you be, either," said Aimee, as she clicked off the switch of the electric. "See you tomorrow—if I can. Good night, old thing."

The room was plunged in darkness, and there was a scraping sound at the window.

"Aimee!" gasped Georgina wildly, fumbling round the wall for the switch. It was some time before she found it, and when she turned it on the room was empty.

"Aimee!" cried Georgina, leaning out of the window.

There came a sudden thumping on the bedroom door.

"Aimee!" said the stern voice of Lady Erythea. "Why is your light on at this hour? What are you moving about for? Is anything wrong?"

"No-no—aunt!" said Georgina, choking, "n-n-nothing much."

"Extinguish your light instantly, and go to sleep!"

With shaking fingers Georgina turned off the switch, and undressed pathetically in the dark. She crept into bed and thought of Alexander—the one touch of untroubled calm on the waters of Jervaulx.

CHAPTER V

On the Job.

Morning and the song of birds. The sunshine streamed into the room, bringing with it the God-given promise of a fine morning; it [illegible] flowers and greening thorn-hedge. Aimee stood and drank it in thankfully, till she realized with a shock that it was past ten.

The only bath available at Ivy cottage was a tub of spring water. Aimee made the most of this, and, dressing hurriedly, came downstairs glowing like a picotee. Billy was in the parlor.

"Morning!" he cried.

"Have you been down long?" exclaimed Aimee.

"'Bout three hours!" he chuckled. "I've covered sixty miles since then. Just a little breather."

"Why—you haven't waited breakfast for me, have you?" she cried.

"Oh, that's all right. Rang a baker up an' got a roll an' milk at Syderford. Nothing done yet—couldn't breakfast without my partner."

Mrs. Sunning, with bare, dimpled arms and her face wreathed in smiles, brought in the breakfast. There were brown ducks' eggs, cream, watercresses and a brace of brook trout.

Billy glanced at his companion from time to time, with a quiet watchfulness.

"Sleep all right, old chap?" he asked presently.

"Rather. Didn't wake up till just now," said Aimee, taking a large spoonful of comb honey. "Did you?"

Billy paused.

"Middling," he said slowly. "Say, partner, what'd you like to do now? Rest a bit?"

"Rest!" said Aimee scornfully. "I want to live, not rest!"

"Ready to get busy on the Sphinx, an' cleave the ether?"

"Yes, right away."

"Good! I'll get her fixed."

Twenty minutes later they met by the shed where the Sphinx was stored. As Billy wheeled the machine out, he looked keenly into Aimee's eyes.

"Partner," he asked, "you haven't anything on your mind, have you?"

Aimee laughed aloud. Her eyes sparkled.

"Do I look as if I had?"

"No, by the Great Horn Spoon, you don't!" said Billy, eyeing her with a flash of admiration. "You look as if you'd face the world and laugh at everything it handed you—from a bunch of roses to sudden death. You're IT! Come on."

They went out through the little gate. Billy did not offer to mount the Sphinx till they were clear of the lane. When he stopped, Aimee observed for the first time that the Sphinx had a brand-new spring pillion-seat clamped to the carrier.

"What's this for?" exclaimed Aimee.

"Why, for you, old chap. Easier riding."

"I didn't need it, Billy. The carrier was good enough."

"Nope," said Billy with determination, "not nearly good enough. Carrier! You ain't baggage, are you?"

"Don't know. It's what a lot of people have called me."

"Who?" said Billy indignantly.

"Oh, frumps."

"There's a lot of indiscriminating people about," said her partner abruptly.

The Sphinx started, and Billy threaded lanes at an easy pace. The soft wind of the morning caressed them as they rode. Not that it had any pacifying effect on Aimee's spirit. The sense of adventure mounted to her head like wine.

"Here we are!" said Billy, turning onto a long, deserted stretch of high road, running delightfully level and straight. He let the Sphinx out. For eighty seconds the hedges flashed by like long green streamers. At the end of a mile and a half Billy stopped and dismounted.

"Now," he said, "we're not going to talk about how to sell the Sphinx yet awhile; the first thing is to put you wise to her. You've got to know her inside out and backwards—and she's the sweetest thing that ever burned gas. Now, look here!"

Aimee kneeled eagerly on the grass, and Billy fluently explained, dismantling the parts as he talked.

For twenty minutes she followed him, testing for herself.

"Why," said Billy with delight, stopping and looking at her, "it's like teaching a duck to swim! You catch on quicker than I can show you—you were born to it!"

"I'm an infant to you," said Aimee admiringly. "What a head you've got. It's everything a motor engine ought to be but never is. Let's take down the cylinder."

They busied themselves dismantling and re-assembling the engine.

"I'll show you how to drive her now," said Billy. "Stationary, till you get the hang of her."

Aimee mounted the saddle, while the machine remained on its stand, and Billy showed her how to control the engine running free with the clutch out. She took longer to grasp this. The controls, though simple, were of an unusual type. In ten minutes, however, she mastered them pretty efficiently.

"Fine!" said Billy enthusiastically. "Parther, the Sphinx is your big sister! Now we'll run her on the road—I'll ride the pillion an' coach you. But for the land's sake go easy with the throttle. She'll rush you clean off the British Isles if you give her any gas."

Aimee started dead slow. The ease and resiliency of the drive, once the Sphinx was running, astonished her. Gradually Aimee increased speed to fifteen and twenty miles. She was intoxicated by the sense of power, answering to the least touch of her fingers.

"Glorious!" she gasped.

"You're doing fine," said Billy, watching keenly. He made her practice stopping and starting, including emergency halts. "Say, isn't she the last word in lady's mounts?"

"Rather!" said Aimee, in spite of a sense of difficulty with her dress and the Sphinx's tank, low though it was. "Except—I feel as if I were all stockings."

"Shucks! what of it?" he answered impatiently. "There's nobody here to see. Try her on the high gear now."

Aimee changed gear deftly enough, and for awhile drove steadily. But the intoxication of speed confused her senses. She made the one mistake she had been warned against. The Sphinx dashed forward like a whippet, and, in trying to rectify the error she made it worse.

"Throttle down!" said Billy sharply.

Intending to obey, Aimee blundered again, and closed down the extra air inlet. The Sphinx roared in protest, and shot ahead like a bullet from a gun. The pace was awful. How the machine kept on the road was a miracle. Every moment promised a devastating crash. In front was a right-angled bend, inviting sudden death. Billy leaned swiftly forward.

Billy Leaned Swiftly Forward.

"Valve-lifter—left!" he said quietly in her ear. Aimee's left hand tightened on the lever—just in time. The steady voice—when a fool would have yelled aloud—brought all her faculties back; she throttled down as the machine slowed, and swung round the bend safely at a bare eight miles an hour—but without sounding the horn.

There was an astonished shout and a cry of warning ahead. A large carriage, with two fat horses and a fat coachman, seemed to be right on top of Aimee's handlebars. She swerved and braked violently, while the horses were reined back on their haunches; the Sphinx toppled sideways, shooting Billy clean through the screen of brambles that covered the ditch.

Aimee performed a sort of semi-somersault, and landed on her feet with an intoxicated stagger. For one awful moment she found herself facing the amazed occupants of the carriage.

She was conscious of the face of Georgina, very white, staring at her open-mouthed, with eyes as big as saucers. Beside Georgina sat a tremendous, elderly lady, gripping a lorgnette, and speechless with anger. A large young man in black, his eyes matching Georgina's for size, had started up and was grasping the side of the carriage.

In a fraction of a second the truth telegraphed itself to Aimee's flustered brain. Aunt Erythea!

Aimee leaped the ditch like a chamois, right over the top of Billy; plunged through the tall hedge as a circus rider goes through a hoop, and vanished.

"Is anybody hurt, there!" gasped Mr. Alexander Lambe. "Is—"

"Nope. Not here," said Billy's voice feebly from the ditch. A pair of booted legs waved among the brambles.

"I never saw anything so disgraceful in my life!" cried Mr. Lambe. "Your number! I want your number. I—I"

Lady Erythea, whose face was crimson, leaned forward and smote the coachman twice violently in the back with the handle of her parasol.

"Drive on—fool!" she said explosively.

The coachman started and whipped up the fat horses. Mr. Lambe staggered as the carriage went forward.

"Aunt," he said, "that—that woman, who was driving, ought to be apprehended! If I had my way—"

"If I had my way," retorted Lady Erythea, "she'd be whipped! She and all her tribe. But the idiot Gervase, of course, was on the wrong side; we've no case. I hope their wretched machine is wrecked. Sit down, Alexander, do you hear!"

Mr. Lambe obeyed, protesting faintly. Georgina, with one hand pressed to her bosom, felt as though she were on the point of heart-failure.

COURT HOUSE NOTES

The criminal docket was practically cleaned up last week and the liquor violators given a taste of the law, but it is generally conceded by all law abiding citizens that the "teeth" in the liquor laws should be both longer and sharper. Joe Thurman of Clarion plead guilty and was sentenced to sixty days in county jail. He is said to have been a partner of Henry Lammers. When arraigned on the charge of bootlegging he stated that he had no money with which to employ an attorney nor did he possess any property. His occupation, he told the judge, was what ever he could get to do. The court appointed G. R. Hill to look after his interests, who, after looking into the matter, advised his client to enter a plea of guilty. Practically the same procedure was had in the case of H. M. Paul of Pegle Grove, who also drew sixty days. Attorney Henneberry was appointed to defend him.

The bootlegging charge against Lloyd and Claire Waite of Rowan was dismissed by County Attorney Jensen upon the understanding that they would enter a plea of guilty to the charge of keeping intoxicating liquors with intent to sell, which they did and Judge McCall imposed a fine of $200 in each case. On Thursday they handed Clerk Goslin their checks for the above amount. The people of Rowan are not satisfied with the outcome of these cases, nor the verdict in the concealed weapon trial.

The bootlegging case against Chas Moon, of Rowan was tried before a jury, occupying three days time of the court. The case was given to the jury shortly before the supper hour and it was nearly midnight before a verdict was reached. The ladies of the jury, to their credit, were for conviction. One or two of the gentlemen held out on the grounds that there was not sufficient evidence to convict. While it was not directly shown that Moon was engaged in the traffic of liquor, the circumstances were such that there was little doubt about the matter. The testimony of witnesses as to his character, his presence at the train with an auto the morning Waite was arrested with a suitcase containing liquor as it was being carried to the auto when the officers interferred, all tend to confirm the verdict of the jury. Mr. Moon was given a fine of $200 and costs by the Judge and given a week in which to raise the money. It is rumored that he may make a clean breast of some of the goings on at Rowan for the past year or more, as he now feels that he has been made the goat in the present matter.—Monitor..

Meeting Tonight For 4th Celebration

Business Men To Meet To Decide About Celebrating In Belmond This Year.

TALK ABOUT A BAND TOO

A meeting will be held in the library basement this (Thursday) evening at 7:30, to discuss the advisability of Belmond celebrating the Fourth of July this year. It is desired that a full turn-out of the business men and citizens attend, so that accurate sentiment may secured on the question. The question of a band will also be brought up.

TWO BIG TIMES

The two divisions of Dr. McBurney's Sunday school class have enjoyed big times the past week. Last Thursday Ray Klemme's division had a "circus" in Tyrrell Park, with a big attendance. It was a real circus, too, in more ways than just the name. All the circus entertainment was there including the tight rope walker, the bareback rider, the ferocious bear and the rest. Tuesday Mrs. Martin's division took a trip to "Fort Dodge," some 22 cars being in the train. The Earn Luick home was the first stop, "Cornelia," where the party had hootch. John Campbell's, the next stop, "Clarion," brought coffee and sandwiches. "Florence"—W. H. Wolle's—found pop, "Eagle Grove"—C. O. Fitts'—brought deviled eggs, cheese and crackers; Bert Anfinson's, "Vincent," was headquarters for pop corn, peanuts and candy; and "Fort Dodge," Ward Martin's, brought ice cream and cake. From there they all attended the movies and wandered home around midnight. Between 70 and 80 people were in the "train." Both affairs were just good time doings, get-together affairs to meet each other and welcome new members to the class, and "they say" both were highly entertaining.

KANAWHA GETS FIRE SIREN

The own of Kanawha has acquired an electric fire siren similar to the Belmond yowler, and now have it installed. The siren will be sounded every noon, as is done here, and in addition the fire company has evolved a system of signals to designate in which part of town the fire may be, when the alarm is sounded. The idea is all right, but the chances are pretty slim of their being observed. When a fire comes along that siren is just going to yell, regardless.

GET NEW FIRE TRUCK

All these small towns around seem to be acquiring the fire-prevention idea, the latest being Kanawha, where they have acquired a Ford truck and are fitting it up for a fire truck, with two chemical tanks recently purchased by the city council.

YEAH, WHO IS HE?

Says the Wright County News last week, under the heading "What Is His Name We Wonder?"—A Belmond man, or a man claiming to be from Belmond, got drunk in Iowa Falls last week and annoyed the nurses and patients in the hospital. He was arrested and given three days in the city jail.

SULLIVAN NEW MAYOR

A special meeting of the city council was called on Tuesday evening, at which time R. C. Morse resigned as mayor of Belmond, and M. D. Sullivan was elected to fill his place by the council. Mr. Sullivan has been one of the council, and as mayor will give Belmond the same good service he has given as a member of the council. Mr. Morse has been in ill health for some time, and decided that he could not under the circumstances give his official duties the attention he felt they deserved. Belmond may feel assured that under Mr. Sullivan the affairs of the city will be given the same watchful care as "Rufe" has given them.

BELMOND SCHOOL NOTES

The Belmond high school track team went to Clear Lake yesterday and came home victorious with 61 2-3 points to 56 1-3 points made by Clear Lake. This was very good for the first meet this year. Coach Crozier took 15 boys in his team. The boys won nearly all the track events but were weak in field events. William Tyrrell took first place in broad jump, Chapman first in 100 yard dash, William Tyrrell first in 220 yard dash. Edwin Christie and Madson tied for first in the 440. Edwin Christie took first in the half mile and Ray Stapley first in the mile. They also won both the half mile and the mile relays.

Last Wednesday the baseball team went to Clarion and defeated the Clarion high school team with a score of 13 to 7. The base ball team is establishing the same record as our basket ball team.

The boys go to Britt, Thursday.

The big event of this week is the Junior-Senior banquet to be held Friday evening in the gymnasium. The Juniors are entertaining the Seniors, high school faculty and the members of the Board of Education and their wives.

We wish to thank all the business firms and individuals who so kindly aided us in the Senior class play by loaning us costumes and stage settings. We are especially indebted to the Hat Shoppe, C. C. McGuire Carlston & Skovlin and the Belmond Furniture Company. We appreciate the cooperation of the public in all our undertakings.

Normal Training examinations come Wednesday and Thursday of this week.

BASE BALL MEETING FAILURE

The meeting called for last Thursday night, at the city hall, was a flat failure, but half a dozen being on hand to discuss ways and means of securing a team for Belmond this year. It is reported that the Legion is considering a team to play week day games, but nothing definite has been done about it at this writing.

TRINITY CHURCH NOTES

Wednesday evening choir practice at the church at 7:30. Let us have an anthem sung fitting our patriotic service.

Thursday evening prayer meeting at the church at 8. Why so few at this important service!

Saturday morning at 10 the class meets at the shurch.

Sunday morning Sunday school at 10 and Bible classes. We had a record attendance last Sunday. We want it increased. Let us have many children in services next Sunday. English service will be conducted. Do not forget that Penticostal Sunday is as much a festive day as Christmas and Easter, yet it is scarcely considered so. Mothers' Day was well observed. We are glad of that. But what about God's Day? Sunday evening the young people will have a devotional service. Let old and young come together in the House of God.

ST. OLAF CHURCH NOTES

Thursday afternoon at 1:30 the class meets at the church.

Thursday afternoon the South Ladies' Aid meets at the home of Mrs. Severt Enger.

Sunday afternoon at 2:00 the Sunday school will be conducted instead of at 10:30. At 3:00 o'clock Penticostal service will be conducted in the English language.

We look for a good attendance at Sunday school and service. Let teachers and parents urge upon the young the importance of regular church attendance. Early piety is the crying need of the time. Let us pray for it and work to that end.

LOSES FINGER IN EXPLOSION

Some small children of a Humboldt family found some dynamite caps along the road last week, and carried them home. The caps looked innocent, and the children did not know what they were. They were placed too near the fire in the house, and one of them exploded, blowing off a thumb and forefinger of one of the boys, and badly injuring the hand.

Doings In The District Court

Several Cases From Belmond Are Disposed Of Within The Past Week.

COURT IS ADJOURNED

Judge Thompson of Webster City adjourned the April term of the district court on Friday after a five weeks' session until June 19th, when he will again return to Clarion to dispose of some unfinished business.

Chas. Moon of Rowan, who was found guilty by a jury of having intoxicating liquors in his possession, has filed an appeal bond in the sum of $500. This gives defendant six months in which to file a petition for a new trail.

Hulda Ersland was given a divorce from her husband John Ersland of Belmond on the grounds of cruel and inhuman treatment.

State Saving Bank of Rowan has been awarded judgment against Frank and Gertrude Toyne in the sum of $13,241.61. The mortgage in question covers 464 acres in Iowa township against which a special execution is ordered. Sheriff Lang will sell the same or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy said judgment at Sheriffs sale on June 11 The defendants are allowed the usual year in which to redeem.

In the case of S. J. Osgood of Iowa Falls vs D. J. Bell administrator of Lewis Bell et al, the court finds for the plaintiff in the sum of $3100 and orders a special execution to sell such portion of their interests in the estate as may satisfy the judgment.

E. W Stone is given judgment against the Anderson Music Co., of Eagle Grove in the sum of $1043.92. The court also finds that plaintiff has valid lien against the property of defendant—all pianos, talking machines, sewing machines, etc.

The Farmers' Cooperative Co. by agreement of parties is awarded judgment against Berkland & Littel in the sum of $401.78 and costs.

F. B. Mathias of Clarion is given judgment against Jones Produce Co. in the sum of $215.90. The case grew out of a dispute over the sale and quality of a carload of apples.

Ina Stumph of Rowan has been granted a divorce from her husband Guy Stumph, who is alleged to have become addicted to habitual drunkenness. Plaintiff is given the custody and care of Garnette and Bernard Stumph and is to receive $30 per month alimony.

Messrs. Stewart, Reese and Richardson, inheritance appraisers, met at the court house on matters pretaining to the estates of Danile Filkins of Eagle Grove, Geo. Nelson of Goldfield and E. B. Roblin of Clarion. The latter estate footed up $18,702.

Another case for the October term of court, filed last week, is that of the Clarion Cooperative Shipping association vs Sam Umstead. Plaintiff alleges that Umstead violated his membership agreement in selling several head of hogs to the livestock firm of Nelson & Russell of Clarion; that the terms of the agreement provide defendant shall

Last Dance In The Old Opera House

Firemen To Hold A Last Big Carnival Ball As Farewell In Old Hall.

ON MONDAY EVE., MAY 21

The last dance in the old hall—the opera house—will be held next Monday night, May 21, when the Firemen will stage a Carnival Ball with full trimmings. Piersol's five-piece orchestra from Fort Dodge will furnish the music, and a big time is planned. The hall is being used thru the courtesy of the Motor Inn Co., who are giving the hall free to the firemen. The opera house has been turned into a garage, and this dance will be the last one for Belmond, unless a hall for such purposes is erected at some later date.

LOOKS LIKE A BARGAIN

Here is a bit of Illinois history that is worth reading and it shows the marvelous development of this country in less than 200 years. In the year 1732 the state of Illinois was bought from ten Indian chiefs by 22 white men of Pennsylvania and England. The territory was in two tracts, one called southern Illinois and the balance of the state together with a portion of southern Wisconsin, was called northern Illinois. The consideration was 200 blankets, 360 shirts, 2500 pounds of gunpowder, 4000 pounds of lead, one gross knives, 1000 gun flints, 200 pounds tobacco, 2 dozen gilt looking glasses, one gross fine steels, 16 dozen garter, 10,000 pounds of bour,, 5000 bushels Indian corn, 12 horned cattle, 20 bushels salt, 12 horese, 29 guns. The articles were paid in full council. The deed was signed and executed before a French notary public at Kaskaskia.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

The large number present Sunday morning at Sunday school and also at the preaching service was very much of an inspiration to the pastor. We welcome all to our social meetings.

The Ladies Aid will hold an all-day quilting in the parlors of the church on Wednesday.

Sabbath school at 10 a. m.
Morning worship at 11:00.
Junior at 3:00 p. m.

TRYING TO SAVE EAST LAKE

Interested sportsmen and citizens from Goodell and Kanawha met at the theatre in Kanawha last week to discuss the saving of East Lake, northwest of Belmond. A canvass has been made in the territory around Goodell and Kanawha, and it is understood some $1,200 has been secured to assist in saving the lake. The dam at the lake went out a year or so ago, and since then the lake has been mostly a slough. It is proposed to install a permanent dam, of conrete, and to take other measures looking toward the saving of this natural beauty spot. In the list of donators is J. W. Griggs, of near Goodell, who heads it with a contribution of $600.

A CORRECTION

In the obituary of Jacob Jacobs last week, it was stated that six brothers survived, whereas there are eight brothers. The Independent was misinformed. He leaves to mourn his loss, two children, eight brothers and one sister. His sister is Mr. John Dorenkamp of Belmond, his brothers are Claus Jacobs of Belmond, Fred of Crawford county, Otto, John and Arnold of Monona County, Herman of Sioux Falls, S. D., Hans of Scotland S. D., and Alfred of Bloomfield, Neb. Four of the brothers from a distance, Fred, Otto, John and Herman were here to attend the funeral. Funeral services were held on Wednesday afternoon at St. John's church in charge of Rev. Wipperman. The members of the Belmond Fire Company, attending in a body, served as pall bearers.

CARD OF THANKS.

We wish to say to our friends and neighbors how much we thank you for your kindness and sympathy and help during the illness and death of our brother Jacob Jacobs and as well to the members of the Belmond fire company for their help and for the flowers sent for his funeral.

His Sister and Brothers.

SENIOR CLASS PLAY BRINGS $310.

The Belmond Senior class play, "Daddy Long-Legs," given at the high school auditorium last Friday evening, drew a crowded house and was a pronounced success from beginning to end. The parts were exceptionally well acted and carried thru, not one of the characters having to be prompted. A matinee was given in the afternoon for the school children, besides the evening performance. The total taken in was $310. This goes to help defray graduation expense such as speakers etc., and any balance will go into the school fund. The universal comment upon the play has been highly commendatory, and the success of it reflects much credit upon those who had charge of the training.

MARRIED

Miss Verna Jones and Mr. Ed. Riggs were united in marriage at Mason City on Monday of this week. Miss Marion Pech and Donald Jones accompanied them. They returned to Belmond the same day and will go to housekeeping here in the near future. The bride is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Jones, and has been making her home with her parents. Mr. Riggs is employed at the Brady Barber Shop. Their many friends, with whom the Independent joins, extend their best wishes and congratulations.

BUILDINGS COMING FAST

The several new buildings and improvements being carried on in Belmond are now going full blast, and beginning to take definite shape. The Schmelz building is well under way, as is the addition to the Belmond Auto Co. garage. E. H. Sands has his building where he will be able to move in within a short time. The Zook Produce building, being erected by Hanson and Fitts, is pretty well completed. The Motor Inn this week moved into their new quarters in the old opera house, which has been remodeled. Work has started on the new Service Station of the Belmond Deep Rock Co. at the Belmond Motor Sales garage. A number of other improvements and some new buildings are in prospect for the near future.

BELMOND TRIMS CLARION 13-7

Last Wednesday the Belmond school base ball team took the measure of the county seaters in a ragged game at Clarion by a 13 to 7 score. The game was rather loosely played on both sides, altho some good work was done at times. Ability to weild the willow to advantage tells the same old story. The Belmond team seems to be able to hit 'em where they ain't at opportune times, and from present indications are going to clean the slate this year.

"A Word To The Wise Is Sufficient"

A Few Of The Laws On Fishing Should Be Learned To Avoid Trouble.

SEVERAL ARE FINED

The Belmond Fish & Game club wishes to call the fishermen's attention to Section 5, Page 27, of the Fish Laws:

Two Lines—No person shall use more than two lines with one hook on each line, in still fishing or otherwise, except that a trot line as above provided. (See 2 page 25.)

Season—May 15th to December 1st.

Sizes—Section 2, page 25: Bass, Catfish and Trout, 10 inches or more. Pike and Pickeral 12 inches or more. Croppies, eight inches or more.

It will be well for all who weild the pole and line to learn the foregoing rules by heart. State officials are coming down hard on all whom they catch violating the fishing laws this spring, and several cases have been taken into court where stiff fines were assessed. Among the recent "victims" were Glenn Thomas of Belmond, A J. Clark of Klemme, and A. E. Johnson of Goodell, all of whom caught game fish without thinking about breaking the fishing laws, and who "suffered the consequences."

In a mix-up at Cornelia last week when deputy game warden D. H. Eley arrested the latter two gentlemen, it is reported that others got tangled up in the affair also and that the warden may prefer further charges. Might just as well play it safe, all who angle for the finny tribe, and save the costs.

GRAVES ENDOWMENT FUND

Eimbrix Post, American Legion, at Belmond,, will place a box on the street Saturday, for the purpose of receiving contributions to the American Legion Graves Endowment Fund. This fund, just started by the Legion of the country, will be invested in perpetuity and the income used annually to provide decorations for the graves of 32,000 American soldiers and sailors whose bodies will forever lie overseas. At least $100,000 is needed—$200,000 can well be used—to increase the nucleus of the principle of this fund, the nucleus of which is a million francs now on deposit in France. Drop your bit in the box Saturday; you never gave for a better cause. "Lest We Forget."

TWO DIE AT EAGLE GROVE

Coronor Walker was called to Eagle Grove Saturday afternoon by the death of Jesse Langland, who committed suicide by hanging himself a few hours previous. The deed was committed in the barn on a farm three miles south of that city, where he was employed by his brother Geo. Langland. Deceased had been in poor health for some time suffering from heart trouble. He was missing for about three hours when a search was instituted and his body found lying on the barn floor. He had tied a rope to the rafter and after adjusting it about his neck, jumped from a partition on which he had perched himself. The fall, some six feet, broke his neck as well as the rope.

Omer Omudson, an attache of World Brothers circus, was instantly killed Saturday night by a Northwestern train a few miles south of Eagle Grove. No one saw the accident and the body was not discovered until two or three trains passed over it. It was badly mangled. Identification was established by means of his membership card in the American Legion at Jewell, where he had resided for some time before joining the circus. His job was to look after the circus horses and it is supposed he fell between the cars while going over the top of them in the performance of his duties. For some reason he traveled under the name of Davis. His father was located in Illinois. The remains were taken to Jewell for burial.—Monitor.

EDITORIAL

A business man of Belmond told the Independent recently that several different farmers wives had askd him if Belmond was going to have a band this year. They expressed themselves as very emphatically in favor of a band, and stated they would willingly give a donation to help finance one. Other people in Belmond have made the same statement; the sentiment is strong that Belmond should have a band. There doesn't seem to be any question but what Belmond needs one, or that one would be a fine thing, both for the merchants and the people. But no one seems willing to take a hold of a band and start it going; no one wants to be responsible; and a lot of people don't want to part with the little necessary coin to get one. Some of the business men think that the crowds will come to town just the same, band or no band; "they want to come to town and they're going to come." Some of them will, undoubtedly; but not all, by a long ways. Those who reside half-way between towns, or even a little closer, are going where the entertainment is. Belmond needs a band, but the chances of one are slim, sadly slim.

The meeting called last Thursday evening to see what could be done about a base ball team this year drew a large crowd of six men. It takes nine players to make a team. Another meeting called later failed to bring out enough to do more than play One-Old-Cat. A great many folks want a ball team this year; a great many favor having one; but it is "let George do it." As "George" is of the same mind about letting someone else do it, nothing is being done. Belmond needs a team, has the material for a good one, and any differences as to when and where to play can be ironed out in meeting. But the chances are slim, sadly slim, of getting one.

What is the matter with Belmond? Why is it so almighty hard to stir up enough enthusiasm to put anything over? You ask your neighbor what he thinks about this or that or the other, and he is heartily in favor of it—sure! But as for getting into the harness and doing a little something to help it along—nay, nay, brother; too busy, no time. "let George do it." Hardly anyone but what thinks a band is a fine thing; a large number want a ball team; but nobody wants to be counted among the front rank in getting them. Where is our community spirit? What has become of the progressive thoughts we entertained but a few years ago? Were they killed in the war? Why, when other towns—smaller than this, with fewer people and less money—can put on community affairs, can we not do it? Isn't it rather a poor recommendation for our town? Donated community labor has accomplished much in other places; why can't Belmond do as well? The trouble with Belmond, folks, is that we all want things, but we want a few people to do all the work, take all the responsibility suffer all the grief, put up all the money, and then let us enjoy it when they have put it across. Co-operation is one way of spelling success, and nowadays it is becoming about the only way of spelling it when used in a community sense. If YOU will work and help and be a good scout, Belmond will go right along, but if you sit back and wait for some one else to do it, you're going to wait a long, long time!

THE 4TH CELEBRATION

A meeting will be held tonight, at the library basement, to discuss a Fourth of July celebration in Belmond. The Independent believes a GOOD celebration would be worth putting on, but there are a few things about one which the citizens of Belmond should take into serious consideration before they jump into it.

There is on use having a celebration unless we have a real one. Everybody has had too much of "celebrations" which were nothing but noise, dirt and crowds.. If we are going to have one, let's make it a good one, put money enough into it to make it a real attration. How much money will it take, and can it be raised?

Belmond needs a band worse than it needs a celebration. If it is to be one or the other, which will we take? Can we have both? Can we get money enough for both? We can if we want to. Do we want to?

If Belmond is to celebrate, then by all means let it be a business men's affair. It it their place, their duty, not that of some other organization. The Legion is talking of having a celebration. The Independent believes that a celebration should be financed, run and controlled by Belmond business men. Not that the Legion would not give us a good one, or that they haven't the finances or abiliy, but that it is not their place to shoulder the obligations of the business men. It is not just or proper that the Legion should do things which the business men by every token are called upon to do. The business men should do it. or it shouldn't be done; there should be no "passing the buck."

If a celebration is decided upon, how are we going to manage it? Before you build a house, you must have a foundation. Why not organize a new Commercial Club, or Chamber of Commerce, tonight, and with this organization go ahead to secure our band, our celebration, and the countless other things Belmond needs so badly? And we need them, gentlemen, far worse than many of you realize. When Belmond becomes a joke over the country; When it is known as a dead one, its credit restricted, its name a cue for grins, it is high time that we woke up. And this is just what it is today. We have let our city drop from the height of progressiveness to the depths of depression; we have retrograded 20 years in the last three, until now we are a standing joke among the traveling men.

By those who are present tonight you will be able to judge what you can do. Every man among us who has a spark of progressiveness about him, who cares a solitary whoop about Belmond other than the number of dollars he can get—and keep—from it, will be there. See what you can do.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

Canning Season Starts—Rhubarb fresh from the garden starts the canning season, and this fruit, in addition to making fine pies and sauces, can be canned to use during the winter with raisins, oranges, prunes, or in marmalades. These recipes are worth trying.

Canned Rhubarb—Remove skin and cut in one inch lengths. Put into sterile jars, cover with water which has been boiled and cooled. Seal. When opened for use, sweeten and cook. You will find that the fruit tastes like fresh rhubarb.

Rhubarb Butter—Chop 2 quarts rhubarb, 2 oranges, ½ lemon and ½ lb. seedless raisins, or put them through food grinder. Cook fruits with 2 cups sugar one hour, or until butter is almost smooth. Pour into sterile jars and seal.

Rhubarb Marmalade—Cut 2 lbs. rhubarb in one-inch pieces; boil with ½ lb. nutmeats in one cup water until nuts are soft. Add 1 cup sugar and 2 thinly sliced lemons from which seeds are removed. Cook until syrup is thick; seal in sterile fruit jars.

Black stockings should always be washed in blue water as this preserves the color much longer.

Figuring that she is cook, nurse, laundress and assistant hired man, it is reckoned that the average farm woman earns $3,796 every year. But she doesn't always get it. —Exchange.

To clean rusty shoe buckles—Scrub with stiff brush that has been dipped in thin paste of sweet oil and emerydust. This removes rust and polishes buckle at same time.

Use discarded phonograph needles for cleaning sour milk bottles, etc. Put a handful of needles in the bottom of bottle with some water and shake thoroughly.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Junior Livestock Judges Work At Drury Farm.

The first meeting of the Junior Livestock Judging club was at the Frank Drury Polled Hereford farm, last Monday evening, May 14th. About fifteen boys were in attendance at this meeting and took part in the practical judging work. The county agent was present and gave the boys a work-out on Hereford cattle and Duroc hogs..

The time was spent in going over the score card and explaining each point in detail by pointing out the different points on the livestock. It has been felt that the best way for boys to get first hand information on judging livestock is to actually see and handle the animals which they will be expected to judge. Through the kind cooperation of Mr Drury, two classes of each cattle and hogs were arranged for the boys to work on.

The work is being planned in such a way that the livestock farms of Wright county will be visited during the next two months and trips will be made to farms of the neighboring counties where good livestock can be found. The junior judges will make trips later to the neighboring county fairs and in this way get practical experience in judging the different classes of livestock. A few of the boys who are taking active part in the judging work are as follows: Everett Woodley, Max Miller, Lynn Thompson, Leo Woodley, Milan Buck, Gilbert Mathias and Fred Moellering.

Soil Erosion Demonstration

A soil erosion demonstration will be held at the Raymond Paine farm five miles northwest of Eagle Grove on Tuesday afternoon, May 22nd, at 2:30. Prof. H. H. Sunderlin of the agricultural engineering department of the extension service at Ames, will be present to conduct the demonstration along this line of work.

The object of this will be to demonstrate and explain the successful methods of filling ditches and preventing erosion. The specialist will discuss methods of preventing erosion and will help build one or more styles of dams.

All farmers who are interested in learning the methods of preventing soil erosion should not miss the opportunity of witnessing the demonstration at the Paine farm next Tuesday. There are many other problems along agricultural engineering lines which will be discussed at this meeting.

Joint Picnic-Club Exhibit in August

At the last farm bureau board of director meeting, President J. E. Kirstein was authorized to appoint a committee of three to plan and organize a joint picnic and club exhibit for sometime next August. The president has named Harry Poundstone Dayton township, chairman and Mrs. Harry Woodley of Grant township and Will Tillman of Lincoln township as the other two members of the committee.

An effort will be made to secure some very prominent man to speak at this picnic. Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and ex-Senator W. S. Kenyon have been suggested as possible speakers. The board has realized that the speaker which we get for this picnic will determine in a large measure the size of the crowd and for that reason every effort is being made to secure a good man. It has been thought best not to attempt to hold a picnic in June as has been the custom in the past because the season seems to be so backward this year and by holding over, it will be possible to hold the farm bureau picnic in conjunction with the club exhibit.

The Boys' and Girls' club exhibit will be held in connection with the picnic and the livestock, poultry and handiwork of the various clubs will be shown. The county has not decided as yet where the picnic shall be held but it is hoped that it can be arranged at some central point. Wright county is unfortunate in not having a county fair and for that reason it will be necessary to arrange some sort of a county-wide exhibit where the youngsters can show their products in the various departments. Expert judges will be present to judge the different club products and award the prizes.

Federation Speaker To Address Booster Meeting.

J. E. Wooters, director of the organization department of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation at Des Moines, will meet with the officers, directors and members of the Wright County Farm Bureau at the county agent's on Wednesday afternoon, May 23rd at 2:00, for the purpose of planning and organizing the spring membership drive which is to follow the publication of the special farm bureau edition.

All officers and directors of the farm bureau are urged to be present at this meeting to get the suggestions which Mr Wooters will give out relative to the effective methods of conducting a membership drive. An effort will be made to appoint territories for new members. The farm bureau has a good live membership at present but it is planning to give every non-member an opportunity to join hands with the other farmers of the county in the support of their own organization.

State Veterinarian Testing T. B. Cattle.

Dr. L. N. Jargo from the state veterinarian's office at Des Moines spent three days last week in the vicinity of Belmond giving the tuberculin test for several herd of cattle.

Dr. Jargo will return to Wright county during the last week in May to follow up the testing work in the herds which have been on the waiting list for the last year or two. According to Dr. Jargo the dread tuberculosis exists quite extensively through the state in some of the best herds. Every farmer of our county should realize the danger which lies in keeping tubercular cattle or livestock of any kind which is affected by this most subtle disease. The fact that it is transmissible to the human family should cause every farmer enough concern to have his herd tested.

HINTS FOR PRUNING

1. Proper pruning gives more and better fruit.
2. It costs less to spray and pick a well pruned tree.
3. All varieties are not pruned alike.
4. Heavy pruning tends to increase wood growth, and may be used to rejuvenate a run-down tree.
5. Light pruning tends to increase fruit production.
6. The growing habit of a tree varies with age.
7. Watersprouts are suually the result of heavy pruning. Those sprouts near the base of the scaffold limbs may be tipped back and caused to produce fruit.
8. A limb grows more from the tip buds than from the lateral buds.
9. Fruit may be thinned by pruning.
10. Pruning wounds need to be painted.
11. Keep the top of tree somewhat open. Light helps to make extra fancy fruit.
12. If the buds on your peach trees have been killed and the fruiting wood is in the upper third of the top "dehorn' your trees back heavily to limbs one inch in diameter.
13. Learn the principles of pruning, the details will vary with the tree.
14. Common sense and good judgment will help a great deal.

The more some people have the more they want, and the more they get, and the sooner they shuffle off and leave it to others to enjoy.

It is easier for some girls to make up their faces than their minds.

Give Us A Chance

If you are in need of a new plow, culi-packer, or tillage tool, give us a chance to quote our prices and go over the machines with you. And don't buy any farm machines on price. The man who buys machines by price alone it taking a dangerous risk. It pays to buy reliable plows and tillage implements the same as reliable binders and mowers. Furthermore, it pays to buy from a firm at home, one that pays taxes in your county, one that helps with the donations for local enterprises, and in fact is a booster for everything that's good for your community. Be sure that the machine you buy carries a reputable manufacturer's guarantee such as is carried by P. & O. plows, Dunham Culti-Packers, and McCormick-Deering tillage implements.

P & O

Many a man realizes that his sins too often find him out, but that doesn't worry him half as much as when his wife finds him out.

Easy Riding, Running, Working

Easy is the right word. It fits the McCormick-Deering Jewell Hammock Cultivator. If there is one feature on this cultivator more noticeable than all the rest, it is the comfort the operator enjoys while doing good work. The hammock seat and easy, natural movements required in handling the cultivating parts, provide comfort which we honestly believe is to be found in no other cultivator. This is not a new, untried cultivator. Far from it. It has twenty-six years of approval back of it. It is a dandy cultivator, easy on the driver and easy on the team. If you want to see a cultivator that is just a little better than any other riding cultivator you ever saw or used, come in and let us show you the McCormick-Deering Jewell Hammock.

THE NEED FOR PRAISE

A craving for praise is characteristic of most young people. But they do not care to be flatterd; they like to have praise when they feel they have earned it. Undeserved commendation gives them little satisfaction and often prejudices them against the amiable but injudicious person who has conferred it.

The hope of winning praise is a stimulus to them. And probably no one ever grows quite indifferent to praise, or disposed to undervalue it, even though the desire to receive it may become less powerful as a motive with advancing years.

"Our praise are our wages," said Hermione in the Winter's Tale. It would make life brighter for many people if that fact were more generously understood than it is. The ordinary person feels that when he pays to have anything done he pays to have it well done, and that he is receiving nothing more than he paid for. Tacit approval is the only appreciation that he permits himself to offer.

"I come to you because you're so pleasant," a lady said to a salesgirl in a department store; and the salesgirl was more pleasant than ever to everyone that day.

Perhaps one of the reasons for the industrial discontent that prevails everywhere is that in the complicated organization of labor and capital there are no pleasant homely relations between employer and employee—no relations in which there is any opportunity to add praise in money, over which dissatisfaction is so often and so disagreeably expressed, might sometime seem not so unacceptable if they were accompanied with some personal and sincere expression of praise.

A stimulant to the young, a lubricant to the middle-aged and elderly, praise helps the world along Give it when you honestly can—and only then.—Ex.

TO GIVE PROHIBITION LECTURES IN SCHOOLS

The prohibition movement in Iowa is to be still further broadened during the coming year to embrace a state-wide educational effort among all school children, according to detailed plans given out by state headquarters of the Anti-Saloon League.

William L. Wade, superintendent of the Wyoming Anti-Saloon League, comes to Iowa on May 15 as associate superintendent to take direct charge of this and other expansion of activity for the Iowa organization.

State Superintendent R. N. Holsaple stated in giving out the augmented plan of work that this would give Iowa the most comprehensive prohibition movement in any state in the union.

Lecturers and exhibit are to visit as many schools as possible in the state during the year, explaining to children the evils of alcoholism and pointing out the benefits of prohibition.

"Young men and young women growing up free of the curse of liquor promise a great future for America", Holsaple said today. "by this work in the schools we hope to end all time any danger of the saloon ever returning to America again."

STRAYING PIG CAUSES ARRESTS AND SUITS

Livermore Gazette: "Sheriff Hanson was up from Humboldt today and took Pat Hoy into custody, and Geo Biegger drove them both back to Humboldt. The charge against Mr. Hoy is threats and obscene language in the presence of some of the Van-Horn family, and complaint was made by them. We believe the matter grows out of a stray pig which was recently taken up by Horace Van Horn, which belonged to Mr. Hoy and which he replevied. Since then the relations between the two have not been of the most cordial, and culminated in the action taken today."

The final chapter of this affair was enacted in Humboldt. The Hoys and Van Horns appeared with their council before Judge Bicknell. Mr. Hoy was accused of threats and vile and abusive language, or matters to that effect. He counter charged abusive and vile language. The testimony tended toward the belief that there had been an altercation over a stray pig that belonged to Mr. Hoy, and that in gaining possession of it he had evoked the strong arm of the law and aided and abetted it with personal conversation about what he could do and would do, and what the victim of his remarks might do if they so wished. It was alleged that Mr. Hoy said he would kick one of the Van Horn women and that he further declared that he would knock her brains out if he ever caught her on his premises. Mr. Hoy explained this as a mistake. His illusion to knocking brains out was in connection with some chickens that were supposed to belong to the Von Horns, and it was the brains of these wandering hens that he was feeling like knocking out.

He also said that the Van Horn woman had used very disrespectful language to him, and had told him to do things that he had no intentions of doing.

The upshot of the whole affair is that Mr. Hoy was put under bonds not to kick any of the Van Horns nor to do anything else bordering on personal violence, nor to aggravate them or annoy them in any way.

FORD FACTORY LARGEST AUTO PLANT IN WORLD

Covering a total of nearly 300 acres, of which 123 are under roof, the Highland Park plant of the Ford Motor Company is the largest individual motor plant in the world. Here the Ford car is built, the castings being received from the River Rouge plant and bodies from the various Ford body-building plants.

The unit of Highland Park includes the main offices, the Highland Park power plant, the Detroit sales branch, the boys' industrial school and the manufacturing unit.

Under the latter head are included the motor assembly, car assembly, motor test, top and upholstery departments, stock rooms drop forge plant, glass factory and others.

Today these plants present the scene of the greatest activity in the history of the company, as every energy is being directed to reaching the 6,000 cars a day schedule set by the manufacturing department.

The manufacture of 6,000 separate units daily presents staggering production figures and calls for the highest degree of accuracy in each manufacturing operation. It means that in the motor assembly department 6,000 motor blocks are handled, 24,000 connecting rods, 48,000 valves and necessary mechanical materials, the installation of 18,000 main motor bearings with other production figures in the same ratio and to a uniformly high standard of quality.

Each of these parts is subjected to exacting balance and micromotor tests and as production at the Highland Park plant increases it is necessarily accompanied with an increase in the accuracy with which each individual part is made in order that the various assembly operations may progress smoothly and without interruption.

Production at the plant has not been increased equipment capacity by increasing man power to the utmost of the mechanical equipment capacity and at the present time 60,000 men are employed at the plant, working in eight-hour shifts six days a week on a twenty-four hour day basis.

In the huge drop forge plant where 6,000 front axles, 6,000 crank shafts and other drop forge parts are made, there has been added aquipment and greater man power is being used to produce the necessary parts and at the same time there has been an increased quality marking every phase of Ford construction.

To guard against the possibility of outside manufacturer failing in this huge production schedule the glass plant, the fabric plant and other allied plants at the Highland Park group are all working on a twenty-four hour schedule.

In the glass factory there is a never-ending flow of molten glass from the furnace mouth at which it is rolled out and slipped along in a 465-foot ribbon to the cutting and where it is cut into lengths and sent to the polishing machines.

In the plant the work on top tops and upholstery are cut and material goes on uncreasingly and sowed by hand into proper parts.

IT PAYS TO SPRAY

By selecting proper sprays, by applying them exactly as directed by the spray schedule and by spraying thoroly so that every part of the tree and fruit is covered, it is possible to produce clean fruit in every orchard in Iowa, according to the Extension Service at Iowa State College.

The kind of spray to be applied in each individual case depends to a large degree upon whether the trouble is a disease or an insect and upon its method of attack.

For all insects having biting mouth parts, as the canker worm and codlin moth, which cause wormy apples, the college advises that lead arsenate be used at the rate of 1 lb to 50 gallons of water or spray solution, together with a half pound of soap to increase the spreading and sticking qualities, will do the job.

Lime sulfur is advised for certain fungus diseases, such as apple scab, and certain insects, such as oyster scale. If liquid lime sulfur is used it should test 32 degrees Beaume. Liquid which has stood for some time should be tested with a hydrometer. When the powder form of lime sulfur is used, from 2.5 to 3 pounds are usually considered equal to a gallon of liquid. In large quantities the liquid form is the more economical.

Bordeaux mixture, a combination of copper sulfate and stone lime, will not control scale, but is an important fungicidal spray. It is usually made by using either 3 or 4 pounds of stone lime to 50 gallons of water. The usual way is to dissolve the copper sulfate and dilute to 25 gallons, then slake the lime and add enough lime to make the other 25 gallons. The two liquids are then poured into a spray tank.

There is plenty of room for you at the top, but the top isn't the place to start.

Many a man with a hard punch is never there when it is time to do the punching.

POISON

Fort Dodge Messenger: One of the nation's leading magazines sent an investigator out in a number of American cities to find out how hard it is to get booze under prohibition. He had no trouble in getting so-called liquor that bootleggers were selling and people were drinking.

"He found it so easy that he could have stocked a saloon in a single day" says the magazine. "In New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, Kansas City, Richmond Baltimore—wherever he went—the bootleggers sold him openly."

The hooch this magazine investigator bought was called "old stuff" and it was claimed to have been smuggled in from Canada or Cuba, with labels that were known before prohibition.

The magazine—which is The Ladies Home Journal—had the hooch analyzed and found it "loaded with death."

Wood alchol bichoride of mercury, carbolic acid lead, acetate nitro-benzol were found in these liquors purchased from bootleggers. Not enough poison to kill instantly but enough for a slow death—and not so very slow at that.

Men and women are drinking his poison everywhere. They think is is "real stuff."

The Ladies Home Journal, calling attention to this feature, is running full page ads in newspapers published in the cities where the investigation was made. The ads are headed "Poison" and a short, effective summary of the investigation is given. Bootleggers will feel the effect of this action. Patrons of bootleggers may not care about the moral side of the liquor question. They may be indifferent to the fact that they are law violators. But they will not drink poison. That possibility will put fear into them that nothing else could.

One of the most effective means in bringing about public sentiment in favor of prohibition was the publication of the facts regarding the effect of alcohol upon the body. Factories, offices and public buildings were flooded with pamphlets and charts prepared by medical authorties telling how alcohol injured the body. That was an argument that "went home." The prospect of ruined health and shortened lives did what all the other arguments in favor of prohibition never could do. It made the matter of drinking something that concerned the individual, not his home, his town, his state or his nation. It said, in short: "Drink if you must, but remember you will be the chief one to suffer—and you will suffer with a wrecked body and a crazed mind." That was the argument that won the day, of man. And those were the days when the best quality of liquor was sold, when the government assured the purity of bonded liquor. That safeguard is gone—another telling point that the Ladies Home Journal brings out in its article. There is no safeguard on hooch. It may be "good stuff" and it may not—very likely it is not. If good liquor is dangerous, how much more damaging must poisonous hooch be? That's a question that will make men ask themselves if it's worth while to take the chance. The Ladies Home Journal is on the right track if it wants to stop the bootleg business.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Disliking the prospect of a month's visit to her austere aunt, Lady Erythea Lambe, at Jervaulx abbey, and her cousin, Alexander Lambe, Aimee, vivacious daughter of the Very Reverend Viscount Scroope, is in a rebellious mood.

CHAPTER II.—She wanders into the park, there encountering a strange youth in trouble with a motorcycle. He laughingly introduces himself as "Billy," American. The two cement the acquaintance by a ride on the motorcycle, the "Flying Sphinx," and part. With Georgina Berners, her cousin, Aimee sets out for Jervaulx. On the way she decides that Georgina shall impersonate her at Jervaulx, while she goes on a holiday. Georgina's horrified protest is unavailing.

CHAPTER III.—Happy in her new freedom, Aimee again meets "Billy." He tells her his name is Spencer, and she gives hers as Amy Snooks, at present "out of a job." Billy offers to take her into partnership in selling the Sphinx. In a spirit of madcap adventure, she accepts. The two proceed to the town of Stanhoe, taking separate lodgings in Ivy cottage.

CHAPTER IV.—That night Aimee visits Georgina and learns that the deception has not been discovered. By her dominant personality she compels Georgina to continue the subterfuge.

CHAPTER V.—On a trial spin next day on the Sphinx, with Billy, Aimee almost collides with a carriage in which are her aunt, Georgina and Alexander. The pair escape unrecognized.

CHAPTER VI.—Georgina learns that Lord Scroope is coming to visit Lady Erythea and, realizing what will happen on his arrival, is in hopeless bewilderment.

"Yes—I was rather upset. But I am better now. Don't let us talk of it. O-Cousin Alexander, there is something I want to ask you," she said suddenly. "I should like your—your guidance. Imagine that somebody who was dear to me—somebody one loved very much—had got into difficulties, and was in danger of exposure. And punishment. That it was in one's power to save them. Supposing that it would help, would it be very wrong to tell a—a fib?"

Alexander regarded her wonderingly.

"Let us give things their proper names," he said. "You mean a lie. You know the answer. A lie is in all cases not only inadmissible, but unthinkable."

"N-not even a little one?" said Georgina faintly. "I don't mean for one's own benefit, of course, but to shield the other."

"There is only one answer," he said sternly. "That other must make a clean breast of it, and bear his own punishment—or hers. No matter how bitter it may be. Whoever indulges in such shielding is equally guilty."

Georgina felt utterly chilled.

"Is not that a little hard?" she said.

"The hard way is the way of the transgressor," said Alexander, with some grimness; "there is authority for that. And yet the friend—I think you said a friend—may give all aid and succor to the sinner, even to the extreme sacrifice of himself. But deceit, even the shadow of it, must by no means enter into the matter. You are asking me what you know perfectly well. But why talk of unpleasant things," he continued, "tell me of yourself, and your life at Scroope, Aimee."

There was small comfort for Georgina the rest of that day. She dressed for dinner in a state of despair. Lady Erythea, as her custom was, even when en famille, came down splendidly bejeweled, and wearing the famous Lambe emeralds—said to be worth a prince's ransom—on her somewhat bony chest. As usual at dinner she was in a good temper.

There was a late delivery at Jervaulx, and a letter was brought into the drawing room afterward, addressed to Aimee Scroope.

"Surely, that is your father's handwriting, Aimee," said Lady Erythea. "My letter will have crossed his. Let us hear what he says."

Georgina would as soon have thought of picking a pocket as of opening another person's letter. But there was no help for it. The letter was dated Scroope Towers, Thursday. At the word of command, Georgina read it aloud, somewhat falteringly.

My Dearest Aimee:

I am writing to your aunt, to whom my love, but find myself with only time before the post goes to tell you I am obliged to leave Scroope earlier than I expected. As I wish to see you before I go, I will come over for an hour on Saturday. I'm sorry it is impossible for me to stay the night. I have news of importance for you.

Your loving,
FATHER.

"It will be the first time," said Lady Erythea, a trifle acidly, "that anybody ever saw your father in a hurry."

The letter put the finishing touch to such a day as Georgina had never dreamed of. She went to bed half an hour later. Before she fell asleep, her pillow was wet.

CHAPTER VII

The Way of the Transgressor.

Georgina awoke with a start. The light from a tiny electric torch dazzled her eyes; somebody was shaking her violently.

"Wake up, old thing," whispered Aimee's voice; "it's like trying to rouse the dead. I'm anxious about you. What did they say about that little stunt on the Syderford road?"

Georgina sat up with a gasp, and clutched Aimee with both hands as a drowning person clutches a life-buoy.

"It's you, is it!" she said fiercely. "I've got you, Aimee—make up your mind to it! This dreadful business is finished. We're done for—especially you!"

"Eh!" exclaimed Aimee, a little startled. "What have you got the breeze up about now?"

"You'll know very soon! Who," said Georgina sternly, still holding her, "was that Man that was with you? Who was he?"

"Man?" said Aimee. "Oh, you mean Billy. One of the best that ever stepped! A clinking good sort."

"B-Billy?" echoed Georgina in a shaking voice. "Tell me. Tell me all!" she said, tightening her grip.

"Well, why not?" said Aimee, and forthwith she related the Saga of Billy. The tale, as it proceeded, seemed to affect Georgina with creeping palsy. When it ended, she was trembling violently. She made two unsuccessful efforts to speak. She reminded Aimee of a hen with something stuck in its throat.

"You are staying with this Man?" gasped Georgina. "This Spencer—in Stanhoe? And he let you do it? The man's a cad!"

Aimee sprang up, tearing herself loose from her cousin's hands.

"How dare you say that! Cad? If there's only one gentleman on this earth, it's Billy!"

She glared at Georgina.

"There's no beastly sentiment in Billy, thank heaven. That's why we became pals; because we want to get away from it all. I see nothing wrong in it—nor does he."

"Then he's a fool!" said Georgina bitterly. "Oh, what can one say?" she groaned. "I know there's nothing wrong. That you are incapable of—of—" she choked. "And this man. From what you tell me, he is just such another as you. He is not a man—he is a child! Or he is from some place where things are—very different from what they are with us. But you are living in Eastshire—not in the desert. You know what Eastshire is. If ever this comes out—as come out it must—your reputation and your good name are gone—finished!

"That, I suppose, you do not care for," she said bitterly, rising and facing Aimee, "but one thing I can tell you and you may believe me. This thing will kill your father!"

Aimee stared at her blankly.

"I know your father, better, perhaps, than you do, Aimee. To Lord Scroope, black is black and white white. No one is more proud, more sensitive. That his daughter should be living in an obscure lodging, under an assumed name—with a strange man she picked up on the high road. I tell you, quite soberly and certainly, that it will break his heart."

There was a long silence.

Suddenly Aimee sat down on the bed and began to cry. She cried with the abandon of a child of ten, but very piteously.

"I never wanted to hurt Dad!" she snuffled. "I didn't think—I didn't see—!"

"Do you understand at last?" said Georgina grimly.

"Y-yes," gulped Aimee slowly, "I believe I do. Dad! I—" she caught Georgina by the arm. "I must keep that from him—I must!"

"We must keep it from him," said Georgina trembling, "at any cost. We must find a way, for his sake and yours. This muddle at Jervaulx cannot be hidden; we must face it. But your father must never hear of—the other thing. What are we to do? He is coming here tomorrow afternoon!"

Tearfully she gave her cousin the news in Lord Scroope's letter. Aimee stared in blank dismay.

"We have till five o'clock tomorrow," faltered Georgina. "I don't care what happens to me—there's nothing I won't do to save you, Aimee." Her face brightened suddenly. "I've thought of a way—"

"And so have I!" said Aimee eagerly. "There's just a chance—go on—let's hear your plan!"

"If we can keep the whole thing quiet till five tomorrow we shall pull through—with luck. Should anything turn up before then, to show that you're not here where you ought to be—we're done for," said Georgina, tragically. "My plan is this: You must go at once—"

A loud clanging interrupted her, as of a vibrating hammer striking a gong. It jarred horribly on the silence of the dark abbey. Followed the crash and tinkle of breaking glass, and the sound of a fall. A second gong spoke with a brazen tongue.

Georgina went very white.

"Great Scott! what's this awful row?" exclaimed Aimee.

Georgina pressed a hand to her bosom.

"It's—it's one of Lady Erythea's burglar alarms," she said faintly. "The house is full of them!"

In half a minute the abbey was galvanized into extraordinary activity. Swift running feet padded along the corridors. The squeak of a maid-servant broke shrilly through the chorus.

Aimee and Georgina stared at each other open-mouthed.

There was a violent pounding on the door. "Are you awake, miss?" said an excited voice. "There's thieves in the house—her ladyship's jewels stolen! Keep your door locked till she comes to you!"

The speaker was heard retreating swiftly down the passage.

"That's torn it!" gasped Aimee, running to the door. "If aunt finds me here—!"

She unlocked the door swiftly and opened it.

"Aimee!" breathed the trembling Georgina, "don't—"

"I've got to get out, I tell you! I can't stay here!"

Aimee looked rapidly up and down the passage. It was all clear. She fled at an amazing pace, and, reaching the landing, was aware of a figure of wrath, very like Britannia, but holding a fire-shovel, striding toward her. It was Lady Erythea.

Aimee doubled like a hare.

"Stop that woman!" cried Lady Erythea. "Stop her!"

Aimee reached the head of the stairs just as Mr. Alexander Lambe, with a jacket over his pajamas, flew to intercept her.

"Stop!" he shouted commandingly. Aimee, in full career, gave him a desperate two-handed push. Mr. Lambe's heels flew from under him, and he came down on the slippery oak flooring with a hearty thump.

"Great Scott! What's This Awful Row?" Exclaimed Aimee.

Down the broad stairs, three at a time, sped the fugitive; in the lower hall the butler, his bald head shining like a comet in the gloom, rushed across the line of communications. Aimee dodged too late; the pursuer made an active plunge, and caught her by the skirt.

"I've got her!" shouted the butler triumphantly. His voice rose to a yelp as Aimee kicked his shins, but he held on inexorably. "I've got her!"

CHAPTER VIII

The Plot Thickens.

By sheer force of arrested impetus, Aimee and the butler spun round each other at arm's length like skaters on a rink; something ripped loudly, the butler, shooting off at a tangent, collided with a suit of armor pedestaled near the wall. The ensuing crash suggested an insurrection in a hardware shop.

Aimee skidded against the wall and, recovering, leaped wildly over the two prostrate relics of feudalism—the butler and the coat of mail—and dashed for the double doors that stood open before her. There was a curious flashing effect as she ran—a gleam, as it were, of whiteness. The next moment she had vanished into the night.

Alexander rushed to the open doors and stared out into the darkness. He heard the sound of the hunt somewhere beyond the fir-trees. For a moment he thought of joining it. But the starlit gloom gave faint encouragement—pursuit seemed very useless. With a sudden impulse Alexander ran back through the hall, turned on the light, and pulled open the door of the telephone call room. He snatched the receiver from the hook.

"Stanhoe police station—put me through quick!" cried Alexander.

Lady Erythea descended the stairs, a superb model for Boadicea among the wreck of the Roman legions. Her eyes flashed fire, her lips were compressed in a thin, tight line, her hand gripped the brass shovel. She glared at the disgruntled butler.

"Tarbeaux!" she cried sharply. "Tarbeaux!"

Mr. Tarbeaux came forward, limping. One hand pressed a crimsoned handkerchief to his nose, which had impacted rather violently upon the good knight's breastplate. His other hand grasped a yard of torn blue cloth, which he waved before him.

"Did you stop that woman?" cried Lady Erythea.

Mr. Tarbeaux' inarticulate answer was in the negative.

"Why not, idiot!" said his mistress. "A houseful of useless incumbrances unable to stop a single—" The empurpled handkerchief caught her eye. "Why, what is the matter, man? Are you wounded?"

"Proud—shed m' blood—ladyship's service!" snuffled Mr. Tarbeaux. "Couldn't help skirt tearin', m' lady."

"What!"

Mr. Tarbeaux, with a silent but splendid gesture, laid the piece of torn skirt upon the hall bench.

"Clue, m' lady," he said, with the air of a bankrupt making the most of his assets. "With this it should not be difficult to trace the thief."

"Trace her!" snorted Lady Erythea. "If you had held on to her there would would have been no need to trace anything!"

Mr. Lambe joined them; his mild eye at once apprehended the significance of the piece of serge.

"I cannot see that Tarbeaux is to blame," he said in his aunt's ear; "he did his best, and after all it is unimportant."

"Unimportant! The infamous creature has got clear away!"

"My dear aunt! That stupid girl cannot have been the thief. You do not really suppose this burglary was committed by a woman!"

"Most certainly I do!" cried Lady Erythea. "I can believe anything of the modern woman—anything! She hid when the alarm sounded, and made a desperate dash for escape when I discovered her. It is as clear as daylight to anybody but a fool! It is certain she had my emeralds upon her at the time, and it is lucky none of you are killed—though it would be very little loss. Tarbeaux, did you recognise the creature whom you allowed so egregiously to escape?"

"No, my lady. It was too dark. And the incident was somewhat sudden," said Mr. Tarbeaux apologetically. "It was a young person—I am unable to say more. But I am sure she was not one of our household."

"I have telephoned the police at Stanhoe," said Mr. Lambe; "they are coming immediately by car."

"A gleam of intelligence at last! Thank you, Alexander—and forgive me—I am overwrought. My censure does not apply to you. The whole affair is appalling!" said Lady Erythea, clenching her hands. "My pearls, the diamond chaplet—these comparatively are trifles—but the emeralds are gone. The Lambe emeralds!"

The audience shrank before her wrath.

"It is incredible! Twelve years ago the abbey was broken into—this is the second case. I had taken every possible precaution, under skilled advice. My safe is modern; I considered I had made the house itself impregnable at night. So it would have been, had I been adequately served. What measures did you take, Tarbeaux? I was absurd enough to think I could rely upon you, in an emergency like this!"

"I retired at the usual hour, my lady, to my room in the passage," said Mr. Tarbeaux unhappily, "as I have done for years, by your instructions, in view of—er—er—an emergency like this. One of the alarms roused me; I rose immediately, only waiting long enough to don a garment—"

"Go on, man, go on!"

"While putting them—while putting it on, my lady, I sounded my bell, which connects with the other menservants' rooms, and ran into the hall. At that moment I thought I heard feet on the gravel outside, and unbolting the front door I rushed out—"

"Leaving an exit for any thief in the house to escape by!" snorted Lady Erythea. "Continue your brilliant narrative."

"But when I reached the open there was no one to be seen," pursued the butler, whose throat ached with the effort to make his mistress hear; "there was, however, a dim light, a mere glow, in one of the windows; I shouted, asking whose it was—"

"Which window?" asked Mr. Lambe sharply.

"I am unable to say for certain—either her ladyship's or Miss Scroope's, which is next to it. Perhaps, if we went out—"

Lady Erythea immediately led the way through the front entrance.

"There is a light full on in one of the rooms now!" said Alexander.

"It is Aimee's room," said Lady Erythea. Like a thundercloud she swept upstairs and beat upon the door of her niece.

"Aimee! Open the door. Why is your light on?"

"I—I'm so frightened, aunt!" cried a trembling voice. "I dare not be in the dark—I dare not."

"I cannot hear you!" said Lady Erythea.

"Have they c-caught the thieves?" screamed the voice tragically.

"Caught them?" snorted Lady Erythea, shaking the doorhandle. "Is it likely a mob of mental deficients could catch anybody? No!"

"Thank heaven!" said Georgina with an explosive gasp.

Lady Erythea started.

"Er! What are you talking about! Will you open the door or not!"

"I'm frightened, aunt! I—I—!" Georgina's voice rose to a shrill whoop.

CHAPTER IX

"Marvelous!"

Lady Erythea recoiled. There were, after all, enough hysterics in the house already. Evidently nothing was to be learned from her niece.

"Go back to your bed and don't be silly. There is no danger," snapped Lady Erythea. The sharp whirr of a motor on the drive below drew her attention, and she hastened downstairs.

The car drew up at the entrance with a jerk and ejected three policemen; a constable, a sergeant and Inspector Panke of Stanhoe, a man of enormous energy for his bulk, with thick black eyebrows and a singularly bitter expression. He ran up the steps, but before he could open his mouth Lady Erythea forestalled him.

"You are wasting your time here! Go at once in chase of a motorcycle that got away ten minutes ago by the Stanhoe road!"

"A motorcycle!" exclaimed the inspector almost joyously, as one who seems his theories confirmed. "Sergeant, get after them at once in the car—take Polson with you. As we didn't meet them they must have taken the branch lane at the crossroads—away with you, man—quick!"

"I shall consider no reward too great, if my emeralds are recovered!" exclaimed Lady Erythea, as the car drove away. "Do you think your men will be successful, Inspector? My butler allowed the malefactor to slip through his fingers in the most fatuous manner. Can you—"

"One moment!" interrupted the inspector. "The thieves were seen then, by your ladyship's servants! Was one of them a woman?"

He had to bawl the question into Lady Erythea's ear-trumpet, which Alexander brought. When she understood, Lady Erythea's eyes flashed fiercely.

"Yes!" she exclaimed, "a young woman. You suspected a woman then—before you came here?"

"I do more than suspect, my lady," said Inspector Panke grimly. "I know!"

"Who was this woman, Inspector, and when do you propose to apprehend her? We have a piece of the creature's skirt!"

"Hah! let me see it at once!" said the inspector, his eyes lighting up. It was brought to him and its capture explained. Inspector Panke examined the yard of cloth, tried its strength, rubbed it, held it up to the light, peered keenly at the torn edges.

"Good!" he said under his breath, and turned upon Mr. Lambe so sharply that that gentleman jumped. "Your telephone, sir—where is it?"

"Who is the abominable creature?" exclaimed Lady Erythea. "And why is she at large, a scourge upon the country, breaking into—"

"She won't scourge it much longer," said the inspector grimly. "I'll very soon give your ladyship news of her—I want the telephone, quick!"

"This way," said Mr. Lambe, and led him to the call-room. Inspector Panke remained at the instrument a considerable time. He emerged triumphant.

"If they get away now—well, may I never handle another case," he said quietly to Mr. Lambe. "I can't answer questions at present, sir; I've got to get busy. If I might suggest that you induce her ladyship to retire, and come round with me yourself—it hampered me a bit, that ear-trumpet, and we've got to be quick—you can explain to her afterward."

Alexander was successful in persuading his aunt to retire from the field, though she went breathing threats of vengeance, and mourning aloud for the emeralds. Inspector Panke made a rapid examination of the safe, the wall beneath Lady Erythea's window, and the ground outside. He took a full description of the missing jewels, and briskly questioned the servants.

"I've only time to say this, sir, before I go," he said, turning to Mr. Lambe. "I recognize the work of Jack the Climber in this case, as plainly as if they'd left the name written on the wall! It was him and Calamity Kate. I thought for a moment it might be Bender Williams, who was released from Portland last month. But it's undoubtedly Jack's job. For some months past a series of daring burglaries have occurred at country houses in various parts of England, and, so far, I'm bound to say they've beaten us; no arrest has been made. The methods of the thieves are so similar in each case, that it is clear to an expert all these jobs were done by the same person—or, rather, two persons, a man and a woman. The man, besides being as smart a hand at cracking a safe as ever lived, seems to have the training of a steeplejack as well. He can climb anything that a fly could get a foothold on; in fact, he's known as the Climber.

"The woman, if anything, is more dangerous than the man. All that's known of them is that they're probably foreigners—some say Americans—and that they use a motorcycle when they're on the job.

"Briefly, what happened here is this: The man got in through Lady Erythea's window. There's the marks of him on the wall. He might have got in still easier by the next one, where the veranda is. But he went in through her ladyship's bedroom."

Mr. Lambe's eyes met those of the inspector; the same thought passed between them; whatever might be said of Jack the Climber's moral character, he was a brave man.

"And so to her anteroom, and opened the safe without waking her—of course, she's pretty deaf. The burglar-alarm didn't go till he'd done it; and for that matter all these precautions of her ladyship's are simply bunco; the house is an easy job for a cracksman. Jack got away by the same road he came, and the only thing that puzzles me is why Kate had to bolt for it downstairs. It isn't usual for her to be in the house at all—we believe her job is helping her partner up and watch-keeping outside.

"However, there it is. And this bit of blue cloth, sir," concluded Inspector Panke, holding it up, "is going to put Calamity Kate in my hands."

He folded the torn fragment of cloth, put it in his pocket, and moved briskly to the door. "Goodnight, sir! Before very long I'll show you the rest of this skirt—and its owner!"

CHAPTER X

Action and More.

Billy Spencer, sitting in his austerely furnished bedroom, looked unusually thoughtful. The night was still young, but his candle was not lit. The whole house, indeed, was in darkness. He sat on the window sill and stared out into the night. At last he wandered back to the bedside, his hands thrust in his pockets.

"The partner," he said pensively, "has got something on her mind. A fellow doesn't need any X-rays to see that."

His lips curled down at the corners.

"I'd give a lot to know what it is. I hate to seem inquisitive. But I'd hate a lot worse to have anything happen to the partner. An' I can sure smell trouble coming. She doesn't fear man or devil. But that isn't always goin' to help a girl. There's times when it's more useful to call up a husky with big feet—like me.

"She'd sure be mad if she thought I was interfering. And she can get mad—the partner. Gee! but she's great! The dinkiest thing that ever happened. But I don't like the way things are framing."

He stood for a while, as if listening; then sighed and lay down on the bed, fully dressed. In twenty seconds he was asleep, breathing regularly and easily.

It was a doglike sleep, of which some men hold the faculty, and very doglike was the manner in which Billy roused himself some hours later. In a moment he was broad awake, and swinging his legs off the bed, sat listening with cocked ears. He moved swiftly to the window and peered out.

There was nothing to be seen. Billy remained where he was for some seconds, all his senses alert. Then, with a gesture of decision, he snatched up his cap, heaved himself out of the window, and climbed down the trellis.

He came silently under Aimee's bedroom window, glanced up at the open casement, took a little nickel torch from his vest pocket, and bent down. Shading the glow with his hand, he examined the soft soil beneath the window. There were five unmistakable neat little shoe-prints visible; the first pair deep and pointing inwards to the wall, the others leading outwards.

There Were Five Little Shoe Prints Visible.

Billy at once ran noiselessly round to the garden gate and peered up and down the lane. No one visible. He returned quickly, got a rake from the shed, and carefully raked over the footprints; also those beneath his own window. Then he made for the gate, and, after a moment's thought, unlocked the shed where the Flying Sphinx reposed. He wheeled the cycle out, freeing the engine, and tiptoed softly down the path with it.

Not till he was clear of the lane and well out on the high road did Billy start the Sphinx, and then only at a very gentle pace. At an easy seven miles an hour he ambled along the road, heading for Jervaulx abbey.

It would have surprised Aimee Scroope considerably had she guessed for one moment how far Billy was abreast of affairs. The carefree, insouciant Billy, who seemed to live for nothing but the Sphinx, was infinitely more wideawake than people gave him credit for. The cool blue eyes missed very little; the brain behind them was able to connect facts together shrewdly.

Aimee had not the faintest suspicion that anybody at Ivy cottage knew she had made an unconventional exit by the window the night before. Billy, however, was perfectly well aware of the fact. Early that same morning, before setting off for Syderford, he had observed the footprints beneath her window, which, to a keen eye, told plainly that Aimee had dropped from the trellis, and later on had regained her room by the same path.

BURNS TO DEATH

Guy Barton, residing near Belmond, received word last Thursday that his sister, Edith Barton, residing with her parents at Adeline, Illinois, had been very badly burned in an explosion. The young lady, 21 years of age, was washing out clothes. The fire got low, and she poured kerosene on it from a can. The oil exploded, setting her on fire and burning her body so badly that she died the next day. Mr. and Mrs. Barton left Friday to attend the funeral, which was held Sunday. They returned yesterday.

SOME FISH!

This is the time o' year when the fish stories begin to come out, and you generally hear some good ones. We heard one Tuesday that sounded good; Matt Barry and J. M. Jensen went to Clear Lake and got ten—count 'em—pike, all of due legal size. And the funny part of it is, they did! We know, because they brought them home, and Wednesday Mrs. Matt cooked 'em and they sent the editor and wife one of them, all cooked an' everything. Boy, they sure were good, and we extend our thanks.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to thank our neighbors and friends for the many acts of kindness and sympathy during our sorrow, also for the beautiful floral offering and spiritual boquet.

Mr. and Mrs. W. J. McLaughlin and Family.

Harry Bohning hands us the following letter from W. E. Albert, fish and game warden, regarding the sizes of fish that may be caught. He states "the other game fish referred to in the section in question means such fish a sunfish, perch, etc., which are game fish and can only be taken during the open season, but upon which there are no size or catch limits. Practically the only fish not game fish which are taken in our waters are carp, buffalo, red horse, suckers, gars and bullheads."

MEMORIAL DAY

Belmond May Have Fourth Celebration

Meeting At Library Thursday Draws Few Business Men Who Favor Event.

LOOK AFTER BAND, ALSO

Library basement, Belmond, Iowa May 17, 1923.—Pursuant to call a good representative number of Belmond business men met in the library basement to consider the advisability of holding a celebration July 4th this year. W. H. Trafford was made chairman, and T. A. Davenport secretary. It seemed to be the opinion of all present that we should celebrate this year. C. M. Morse, Commander of the Eimbrink Post proposed that the Legion boys would like to put on the celebration, they to have all concessions, and to furnish all police and clean up the streets after the celebration, and be allowed to charge a nominal price for the ball game.

The matter was quite thoroughly discussed and every one present seemed to be favorable to the plan of letting the Legion boys have complete charge of the celebration, and it was moved and carried that the whole matter of the 4th of July celebration be placed in complete charge of the Eimbrink Post, with the understanding that the Mayor and City Council would have to be asked to give their consent. Dr. A. W. Russel being present, said that as for himself he thought the mayor and City Council would be willing to give their consent.

The idea of band concerts for the season was next taken up and talked on to some extent. Adolph Skovlin said that the Clarion band was considering making Belmond an offer to give us weekly concerts for the summer.

On motion Adolph Skovlin, Cyril McGuire, and C. M. Morse were appointed a committee to ascertain what can be done in regard to a band and also to see what can be done in the way of raising funds for the maitenance of a band.

C. O. Fitts gave a short report of the condition of the Belmond Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. Larsen gave a report as to the workings of the Garner Chamber of Commerce.

On motion meeting adjourned.
T. A. Davenport, Secretary.
Wm. H. Trafford, Chairman.

BELMOND IN TOURNAMENT

The Belmond high school team is among the teams entered in the tournament at Britt on Friday and Saturday of this week. Their first game with their first opponent will be Friday at 9:00 a. m., when they meet Plover. The same day Kanawha and Garner, Buffalo Center and Corwith, Bode and Britt meet. The winners play Saturday forenoon, and the winners of the winners will fight it out Saturday afternoon at three o'clock. Belmond is doped to win the tournament, but some of the other teams entered are strong agregations and they will have to fight every foot of the way if they bring home the bunting.

First Game Goes To Belmond Sunday

Garner Team Falls Victim To Heavy Batting Of Local Boys In Easy Game.

FINAL RESULT IS 15 TO 5

The first game of the season was played Sunday between Garner and Belmond, and resulted in a victory of 15 to 5 for Belmond. As neither team had had much of any practice, the errors were numerous on both sides, but the ability of the home boys to slam the ball gave them the game. They clouted it frequent, not to say often, and hard, Dillon being the star with five safties out of five attempts. Two home runs, by Fulton and Chapman, were the heavy drives, Chapman's being the comedy hit of the year!

The Garner players didn't do so badly as they might of, and registered a homer of their own. Clark, Garner pitcher, had his head and a stright ball and used them both to pretty good advantage, but the boys found him in the fifth and acquired a big lead.

The game was not very well advertised and as a result the crowd was rather small. The game was orderly and everything went off in approved fashion. The Belmond team as organized will continue, it is understood, and more games will be played. The line up Sunday was as follows:

Thomas, catcher.
Chapman, pitcher.
Packard, 1st base.
Jones, 2nd base.
Nelson, 3rd base.
Madsen, short stop.
Dillon, left field.
Fulton, center field.
Petschow, right field.

MESERVEY LAD INJURED

On Tuesday of last week while Lincoln Paul, one of the younger sons of Mr. and Mrs C. F. W. Paul, was helping his brother shell corn with a two hole corn sheller run by a gas engine, the fly wheel broke into a number of pieces, one piece striking Lincoln on the left side of his head, fracturing the skull. He was unconscious for a number of days and since then has shown but slight improvement. Dr. Young and Dr. Agler attended him, and a nurse is caring for him. The little fellow is getting along as well as can be expected, and his many friends are hoping for his complete recovery soon.—Meservey Correspondent.

MAYOR MORSE PASSES AWAY

R. C. Morse died at his home in Belmond on Monday night, after a stroke suffered a day previous. He had been in very poor health for several weeks, and for a number of years his health had not been good. After the stroke Sunday his death was momentarily expected. Funeral services will be held at the house this afternoon.

FIREMEN'S DANCE BIG AFFAIR

The last dance in the old opera house was held Monday night when the firemen's carnival ball held forth with a crowded house in attendance. The hall had been decorated up in fine style, and all the trimmings of carnival time were on deck to give the proper atmosphere. The firemen took in something over two hundred dollars and expect to clear around a hundred and ten dollars. A very fine time is the universal report.

ROYAL NEIGHBORS MEET TUESDAY AT CLARION

The presence of so many nice looking ladies here Tuesday was accounted for when it became known that the ninth district convention of the Royal Neighbors was in session in this city, says the Monitor, and the ladies in question were delegates from the various towns of the district. The convention was one of the largest in the history of the district and the Carion lodge proved equal to the occasion in their efforts to entertain the visitors. Thirty towns comprise the district.

LET GRADING CONTRACT

The grading contractors, who were awarded the Clarion and Eagle Grove jobs last week, are already on the ground with their outfit of trucks. When the board of supervisors came to award the contracts there were so many bidders, over 30, that the letting was adjourned from the supervisors' room to the court room. The successful bid on the grading jobs were made by J. W. Peed & Son of Fort Dodge. Their price for the Clarion project, the mile east and west of town, was 25 cents per cubic yard, and for the proposed county road south from Eagle Grove to the Hamilton county line, the bid was one-half cent less per cubic yard. The tiling of this road was awarded to Knutson & Christensen of Rockwell at $10.40 per hundred feet of six inch tile and $25 per hundred feet of ten inch tile. The draining of the Clarion road is already completed.—Monitor.

The Britt band was in town on Saturday afternoon and gave a short concert on the street. They were here advertising the high school base ball tournament to be held there this week. Belmond will participate in the tournament, and naturally is expected to bring home the bacon.

YOU AND YOUR TOWN

No matter how little to do and see,
There is in your town, on your street,
No matter how lively the place may be,
No matter how dirty or neat;
If you think it's nothing at all to you
Whether anything happens or not,
So long as the business you manage to do
Pays you to stay in the spot;
If you have no feelings of sorrow or pride
For the looks of the town or its name;
If you're just that selflish- you're satisfied
With playing your own little game,
Why, then, here's what I think of you,
And I'd say the same to your face:
I don't care a darn how much business you do,
I call you a town disgrace!
Why don't you take off your coat and join
With the rest of the population?
This isn't a day of "each one for the coin,"
It's a day of co-operation.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE

When a business man becomes a member of a chamber of commerce his worth to the community as such member is measured by his faith in the institution and what he personally contributes through individual effort toward proving the success of the organizaion, writes Edwin B. Lord, sectretary of the Massillon (O.) chamber of commerce . Such men usually are broad in their views They are men of faith. They are prepared to bow to the rule of the majority, even though it may not suit them personally.

Ever since chambers of commerce have been in existence there have been men who profited by the work of others, yet who did nothing personally to promot the civic advantages upon which their individual success invariably was more or less dependent. Such men usually think they are fooling the other fellows who are doing the actual work of building up the city; but, in the last analysis, they are cheating only themselves, for they never realize full dividends upon their efforts because they cannot understand that the best way of helping oneself is to help the other fellow. These men are never found on the firing line. They are the faultfinders, the destructive critics.

In each community, however, there are men who take pleasure in advertising their home town and cultivating their civic pride. These are the men of influence in the local chamber of commerce, and they are the men to whom the community looks for support and guidance when plans or work involving the welfare of the community is under consideration.

It is from this class of men that the best and most successful member of a chamber are recruited, and without such men many cities now occupying front ranks in industrial commercial or civic development would still be hidden in the obscurity enveloping all places lacking civic pride.

CRITIC OR KICKER

There are two classes of people in this country who are constantly in the public mind—constructive critics and destructive kickers.

The constructive critic is a person who looks always to the welfare of his country, or to that of his state or community. He analyzes questions of import to the people with a fair and just mind, separates the good from the bad, and seeks to advance the interests of the one and to retard those of the other. To accomplish this end it often becomes necessary for him to point out to others those salient features which to him appear to be to the best interest of the people, and to expose and oppose that which is inimical to the public weal.

A kicker is one who does not analyze his subject, who voices his objection hastily and without proper investigation, who often opposes a proposition simply because some other person or persons favor it, and who is invariably found on the negative side of questions that come up for public discussion. He is a man who never leads and will not follow.

Think hard—which are you?

ERRORS IN THE PAPER

"The editor does not want anyone to send him any more copies of his paper in which they find mistakes," complains a Missouri exchange. "If they find a perfect copy, however, he will pay a big price for it. If the fool critic who hunts for mistakes in newspapers would find them all, he would be kept busy. We will be pleased to buy copies of any paper which can be proven entirely free from errors, either typographically or in statement of fact. We will be pleased o find a merchant who never made a mistake in putting up an order; a lawyer who never lost a case through his errors; a doctor who never wrongly diagnosed a case; a druggist who never made a mistake; a postoffice offical who never put mail in the wrong box; a woman who never forgot to put in salt while she was cooking, or to put in the tea pot before putting in the water. Bring in some of your misakeless paragons who find it so easy to criticize the newspapers and we'll give 'em the chance of their lives to find out whether they are really human."—Exchange.

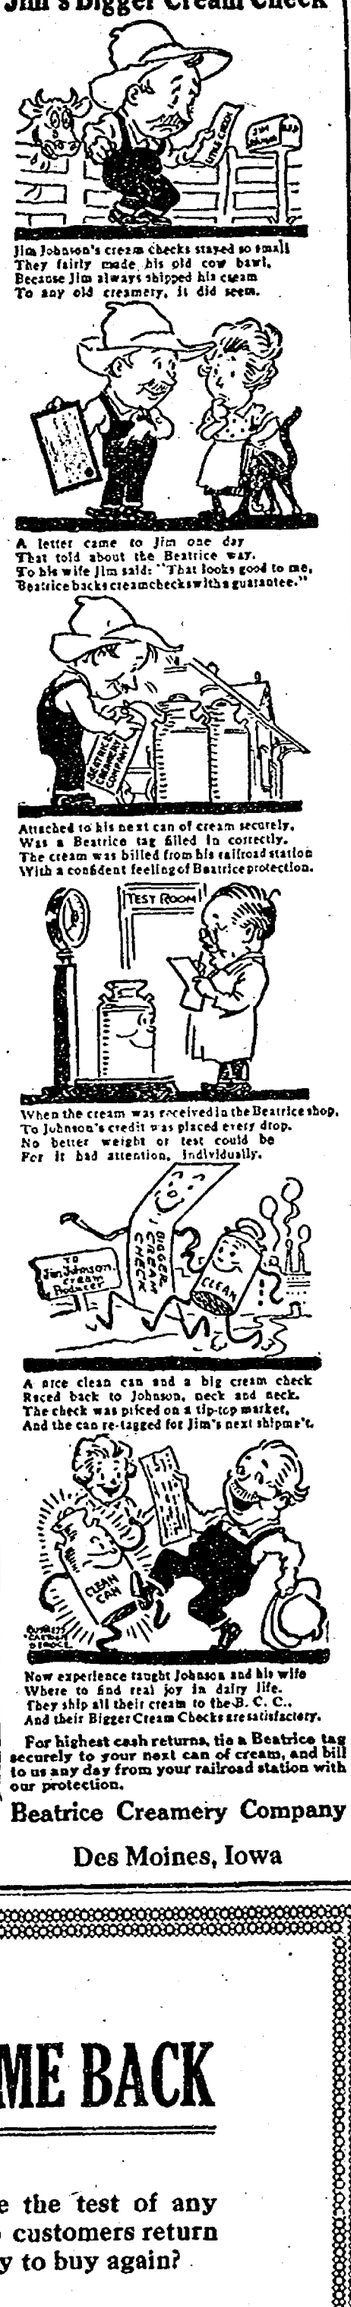
Jim's Bigger Cream Check



Jim Johnson's cream checks stayed so small
They fairly made his old cow bawl,
Because Jim always shipped his cream
To any old creamery, it did seem.

A letter came to Jim one day
That told about the Beatrice way.
To his wife Jim said: "That looks good to me.
Beatrice backs cream checks with a guarantee."

Attached to his next can of cream securely,
Was a Beatrice tag filled in correctly.
The cream was billed from his railroad station
With a confident feeling of Beatrice protection.

When the cream was received in the Beatrice shop,
To Johnson's credit was placed every drop.
No better weight or test could be
For it had attention, individually.

A nice clean can and a big cream check
Raced back to Johnson, neck and neck.
The check was picked on a tip-top market,
And the can re-tagged for Jim's next shipme't.

Now experience taught Johnson and his wife
Where to find real joy in dairy life.
They ship all their cream to the B. C. C.,
And their Bigger Cream Checks are satisfactory.

For highest cash returns, tie a Beatrice tag securely to your next can of cream, and bill to us any day from your railroad station with our protection.

Are they doing well---as well as you would like? Are they getting the necessary mineral in their rations?

Completion of the mineral feeding experiments at the Iowa Agricultural Experiment Station show that all the hogs which were fed minerals in their rations made better gains than the hogs in the check lots fed only on a cornbelt ration. FARM BUREAU NOTES

Specialiast Visits Experiment Plots

The farms of Harry Inners, Goldfied, A. E. Martin and Louis Hauge, of Belmond, and W. F. Mechem, of Clarion, were visited last week by B. E. Heitzman, farm crops specialist from the extension department at Ames. Mr. Heitzman's mission in coming to Wright county was to assist the county agent and the farmers mentioned above, in laying out the experiment plots for the corn and soy bean tests which are to be run on thtse farms this year.

H. A. Flett, Vernon township, Harry Inners, Liberty township and A. E. Martin, Belmond township, are cooperating with the county agent and the extension deparment in conducting the corn yield experiments on their farms. From eight to ten samples of different varieties of corn have been planted on each of these farms, the object being to compare the different men's corn when growing under our local climatic and soil conditions. The results of the corn yield experiments are valuabe to all farmers who contribute samples to the test because it indicates to them what varieties will give best results under their local growing conditions.

Louis Hauge, Belmond township, and W. F. Mechem, Lincoln township, are cooperating with the county agent in conducting the soy bean experiments. Each of these men have planted ten samples representing ten different varieties of soy beans, the results of which will be to determine variety of beans will give best results under Wright county conditions Three pounds of each variety have been planted in each man's field using about four rows of corn for each variety. The demonstration will be held at each of these farms next fall and a specialist from the extension department will be brought into the county to explain the merits of the different varieties of beans.

Contest For Club Members

Members of the various boys' and girls' clubs of Wright county have been invited to enter a story writing contest and as a result, the county agent's office has been flooded during the past few days with stories from all corners of the county.

Each club member, who enters the story writing contest, is requested to write a sory in his own words giving a full account of his experiences in club work, telling first of all how he became interested in the club activities and secondly, his experiences as to how the work has been carried on. Many interesting stories about different kinds of clubs, including purebred gilt, baby beef, proultry and garment club work, has been received at the county agent's office and the three best stories will be printed sometime later.

A committee consisting of the county superintendent, Mrs. M. L. Clark, chairman of the girls' club committee, and H. J. Metcalf, who is assisting with the special farm bureau edition, has been appointed to judge the stories which have been written by the youngsters. Three prizes of $5.00, $2.00 and $1.50 each have been arranged for the winners of the story writing contest. About twenty club stories have been received which indicates that the boys and girls are interested in telling about their club work.

Live Social At Bell Home

The home of Mrs. J. J. Bell, four miles north of Clarion, was the scene of a lively community social last Thursday evening when the regular monthly meeting of the Grant Township Farm Bureau was held at her home This comfortable home was packed with interested farmers of that community to enjoy the social evening and to hear the splendid address by Rev. J. B. Walker of Clarion

Alf Huntley, director of the township farm bureau, who was in charge of the meeting, opened the program with a short talk followed by an interesting school program, which was prepared by the local teachers This part of the program consisted of recitations and several musical numbers. Readings were also given by Mrs. A. H. Box and Mrs. Harry Woodley. The address of the evening was given by Rev. Walker, who gave an interesting survey of world conditions. In speaking of farm conditions, Mr. Walker expressed the thought that the outlook for the farmer is not very promising, but that we should all be hopeful of the future and work with the expectation of having better conditions later. It is very evident that Mr. Walker not only makes a study of world conditions, but understands the present conditions of the farmer and seems intensely interested in the problems of the farmer of this community.

Boys to Judge at Denby Farm

Boys who are interested in the junior livestock judging work will meet at the H. N. Denby farm, two and one-fourth miles northwest of Clarion, next Friday afternoon at 2:00 for the purpose of working over two classes each of Mr. Denby's Horned Hereford cattle and Poland China hogs. This will be the second meeting of the judging club for actual work in handling and judging the livestock.

Everett Denby, a member of the champion judging team of last year has kindly agreed to arange the classes for the boys to work on next Friday. There are about ten boys at present who are interested in this junior livestock judging work and the number seems to be increasing at every meeting. All boys and girls too, of the county who are interested in taking part in t he junior livestock judging work are urged to be at the Denby farm next Friday at 2:30 to take part in this judging contest.

"Time For Spraying Fruit Trees"

The time to apply the second spray or calyx spray is at the time when ninety-five per cent of the petals have fallen. The material to use for this spray is five quarts of lime sulpher and one and one-half pounds of lead arsenate to fifty gallons of water. This will control the apple scab and other fungous diseases; also the codling moth, cankerworm and curculic.

It is quite important that this spray be properly applied in order to control the codling moth, the larvae of the first brood of which enter the apple through the blossom end, and cause so much wormy fruit. The object in spraying at this time is to force the material into the open calyx before it closes. To accomplish this result it is necessary to use plenty of pressure and fine mist-like spray.

Trees not bearing fruit this year, should receive this spray also, to prevent fungous diseases and leaf-eating insects from injuring the foliage. Use the same material for cherries, American and hybrid plums as for apples. Apply just after the blossom shucks have fallen, or, in the case of the farm orchard these may be sprayed at the same time as the apples.

The third spray should be applied to the fruit trees ten days to two weeks after the second spray. The spray should be prepared at the rate of four and one-half quarts of lime sulpher and one pound of lead arsenate to fifty gallons of water. This is for the control of the codling moth apple scab, apple blotch and curculic.

It is only necessary to spray the trees which have set a crop of fruit at this time. The apples have grown considerably, and as the insects and diseases are still present, it is necessary to give them a good coating of spray material for protection. This can best be accomplished by using a high pressure in case of power outfits and small discs in the nozzles of the hand outfits, which will give a fine misty spray that will go farther and give more thorough results.

Sixteen Accredited Herds in County

According to a report just received from Dr. L. N. Jargo, assistant veterinarian who has been working in Wright county for the past two weeks, states that Wright county has sixteen herds of cattle which are free from tuberculosis.

It is gratifying to the people of our county to know that many of our farmers are becoming interested in freeing their herds of disease. Up to this time our county has had only three accredited herds but since Mr. Jargo's last trip in the county this list has been increased to sixteen. A complete list, up-to-date, of farmers owning accredited herds is as follows: Geo. P. Hardwick, A. E. Martin, Harm Steenblock, M. G. Luick, A. Dell Luick, Thomas Brooks, J. P. Courtney, D. H. Delaney, James Finn, Harry Groen all of Belmond; J. S. Bell, J. E. and G. C Kirkstein, all of Clarion; J W. McFadden and Thomas Ross of Dows; J. L. Reddick of Eagle Grove.

TRANSPLANT TREES IN WINTER TIME

"A home is more liveable with a tree beside it," sa H. C. Cornell, extension landscape architect at Iowa State College. But the question always has been how to secure trees for the farmstead without going through a period of tiresome waiting.

As a solution to the waiting problem, Mr. Cornell declares it is easier cheaper and less risky to dig up and move a frozen ball of dirt containing the roots of a tree than it is careful to transplant those same roots during the spring or summer, when they will be disturbed by handling and subjected to the ill effects of dry weather. Now is the slack time of year on the farm and the ideal time to do this kind of work.

After definitely selecting the place where the tree is to be located, a patch of ground about ten feet in diameter should be covered with twelve inches of fresh stable manure which will thaw out the surface of the ground and make the digging easy. Trees up to eight inches in diameter can be moved without special equipment. If the tree being transplanted is about this large a circular, straight-walled trench with a radius of three feet should be dug about it so as to make the ball of earth include the majority of the small fiberous roots. After the trench is dug, allow the exposed ball to freeze solid while you dig the hole for the new location. This should have a depth equal to the height of the ball and should be slightly larger in diameter.

When all is ready, the tree with its ball of frozen earth should be carefully loaded on a stone boat and hauled in an upright position to the hole, into which the tree may be skidded. Manure may be mixed with the dirt used to fill in the hole care being taken not to allow it to come in direct contact with the roots. Following the moving, the tree should be pruned to make the roots and top balance.

RURAL SCHOOLS EXTENDING SCHOOL YEAR

Four years ago the 38th General Assembly of Iowa changed the required length of school year for each school district from six months to eight months. While practically all town, city and consolidated schools previously had been maintaining their school for nine months no rural school held more than eight months of school, and not a few conducted school but six or seven months. Since the new law have an eight month term or more. Many county superintendents report an increasing number of schools advancing, to nine months some counties reporting a third or a half on the nine months' basis. It seems inconsistent for the state to permit pupils completing eight years of eight months each of elementary work in rural schools to enter high school, when the grade pupils of that same school are reqiured to attend eight years of nine months each to enter the 9th grade of the same high school. There is a difference here of eight months' training, or one year of work. That more complete training in rural schools is necessary for competition in high school with pupils of more training is instrumental in establishing the nine months' term in rural schools.

THE BIRDS LIKE LOWA

With the call of the meadow lark and the songs of many other migrant birds filling the air all Iowa is one of the wealthiest states in the union from the standpoint of bird population.

A component part of the great Mississippi Valley, which is conceded to be the world's greatest bird migration highway, Iowa is fortunate in having birds as her friends. Only the migration highway which crosses the Mediterranean sea begins to compare with the Mississippi Valley in bird wealth.

More than 300 species of birds have been observed in Iowa in a single year. Some northern birds that are usually driven as far south as Iowa were not recorded this winter, according to J. E. Guthrie of the zoology department of Iowa State College. The Bohemian waxwing which sometimes winters here, was reported but Dr. Guthrie is not sure of the identification. The snowy owl and the rough legged hawk that sometimes winter north of the Arctic Circle were not observed in Central Iowa this season. Some other birds that winter here are the golden crown kinglet, white-breasted nut hatch, downy woodpecker, brown creeper, chickadee, the cardinal and the tree sparrow. Larger ones include the crow, blue jay, red-shouldered hawk, sparrow and the red-tailed hawk. About 20 species ordinarily winter here, Dr. Guthrie said.

"The late March blizzard," said Dr. Guthrie, "caused much suffering and death among the early birds that arrived here in the middle of the month. Birds now arriving include the cedar waxwing, rusty blackbird and bronzed grackle.

This country shelters many great men, but most of them are too modest to make themselves known.

The class day program at the M. E. church last Friday evening was well attended and the Senior Class rendered their different parts well, every number being heartily applauded.

OBITUARY

Albert M. Jones was born at Jonesville, Lincoln county, Ohio, on Nov. 20, 1844, and moved to Des Moines, Iowa, with his parents in 1847. He enlisted in the Civil war on March 29, 1864, and was honorably discharged on June 21, 1865. He came to Story county in 1873, where he was united in marriage on April 8 to Aurilla Ray, and to that union were born three daughters and one son, who were with him when the end came. Mrs. Lena Lycke of Boone, Mrs. Addie Peters and Mrs. George Dirksen of Alexander and Melvin Jones of Waterloo, Ia. He leaves to mourn his death the bereaved wife and children, one brother, Clifford Jones of Carroll and two sisters, Mrs. A. Eckard of Gilbert, and Mrs. Geo. Heggen of Ames, Ia. He reached the age of 78 years, six months and one day.

Final services were held Monday afternoon at one o'clock at the St. John's Evang. church, conducted by Rev. J. Schaffer, former pastor of the Reform church at this place, and burial was made in the Hampton cemetery. The bereaved ones have the entire sympathy of the community in their sad grief.

THE UNDERPAID FARMER.

The United States Department of Agricultural recently compiled a survey of over 6,000 representative farms in an effort to ascertain what return average an American farmer gets from his invested capital. The results are not only interesting but instructive, especially in view of the recent Supreme Court decision which affirms the principle "that legislation which precludes a fair return on the investment which it effects is confiscatory and unconstitutional."

The Department of Agriculture finds that the avreage invested capital of these 6,000 farms is $16,400.

The average return on this capital in cash was only $1,500—less than 4.5 per cent.

That return, however, does not include one dollar for his labor. To get the less than 4.5 per cent on his investment he has had to work for nothing.

He has had, however, an increase of $202 in inventories, crops, live stock and machinery which makes his total gross earning on his investment a little less than 6 per cent.

Estimating the value of his labor at the figures decided upon by three different surveys, as to how much is required to support a family and live decently without saving a dollar, he should be credited with $1,900 per year in addition to his gross return on his invested capital. From this might be deducted the $294 which the department reports show was the value of food and fuel consumed on the farm.

Putting the 6,000 farms on the same financial basis with the New York Telephone Company, or the railroads which are guaranteed 5.5 per cent on their stock (watered or otherwise), the farm as a commercial enterprise, is losing over $1,500 per year. This may explain the cause of nearly thirteen thousand millions of dollars of indebtedness recorded againt American farms and farmers.

Legislation that permits a charge of 9 per cent interest to the farmers for the use of government money, together with high freight rates, might be contrued as "confiscatory" —when viewed from the fact that the gross cash earning will not pay it.

The Supreme Court decision in the case of Prendergast vs. New York Telephone Company, will also have the effect of blocking the "Farm Bloc" in the proposed program to lower railroad rates, and it will effect legislation in nearly every state and city.

Following this line of argument to its logical conclusion, the day may come when professional people school teachers and superintendents printers and preachers, engineers and skilled mechanics, will capitalize the money and years of time in preparing themselves, and demand a fair return on that investment in addition to a reasonable wage or overhead expense. The knowledge acquired after years of study and expense certainly becomes invested capital—at least as much as a piece of inanimate machinery, or a mine mule.—Ex.

When you have become perfect yourself you are competent to make suggestions for improvement in others.

Two wrongs never make a right but some people go on the theory that a dozen will turn the trick.

Carl Sandberg was very close to her average and he received the second scholarship. The graduates are the Misses Mae Griggs, Thora Carpenter, Margarete Kearney, Carl Sandberg and Dale Chase. Four out of the five are planning on going to college this fall.

Friday, the last day of school, was observed by a picnic and ball game at West Lake. Klemme played Goodell. The game ended with a score of 10 to 5 for Klemme. This closes Mr. Nelson's term in Goodell. He will be missed in the community as he was active in the social and religious work of the community.

ITEMS OF IOWA

C. F. Crow, of Massena, Cass county, tells of the wonders of the radio. He says that when Neal Yager tuned in his radio last Thursday evening he was a much surprised "fan" when the Long Beach station in California announced Miss Delpha Comer would play the piano. Miss Comer is a granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Comer of Victoria township, and daughter of Roy Comer, undertaker at Long Beach, a former resident of Cass county. Her father was here visiting in the vicinity at the time but did not know until later that local fans had tuned in on the ether in time to get her.

Frank W. Dusey, of Creston, a civil engineer, has been figuring altitudes at Des Moines and makes the following interesting announcement The Des Moines river is higher by 90 feet than the Mississippi at St. Paul, and falls 90 feet further between Des Moines and Keokuk than the Mississippi from St. Paul to Keokuk. The river here has an elevation of 773 feet and is 1659 miles from the Gulf of Mexico. The Union Station is 805 feet above sea level, the capitol grounds 859 and 1171.

Iowa farmers slaugthered over three-quarter of a million hogs on their farms in 1922. The average number of hogs butchered on Iowa farms in that year was 3.6 hogs per farm according to the report of Leslie M. Carl, of the division of crop and livestock estimates of the United States Bureau of Agriculture economies. Applying this average to the total number of farms in Iowa, 213,439, as given by the 1920 United States census, this would indicate a total of 768,000 hogs that were slaughtered on Iowa farms in 1922

Heroism of his wife saved the life of Wesley Schwalm, farmer near Muscatine, when he was knocked unconscious by a bolt of lightning in his barn during a recent storm. A mule ten feet from Schwalm was killed and the barn set on fire. Mrs. Schwalm rushed in and dragged her husband to safety, then went back and led seven horses out and drove a car out of the blazing barn. The barn, pigs and equipment were a total loss. Schwalm recovered.

WRIGHT CO., SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

The annual meeting of the Wright County Sunday School Association will be held in the Presbyterian church of Dows on Thursday, May 24.

There will be morning, afternoon and evening sessions, and it is urged that as many as possible plan to attend some or all of these services. The committee in charge is planning on a big get--together picnic dinner on that day. Everyine is invited.

Speakers who understand the various phases of Sunday school work will be present to give that knowledge to those who attend the meetings. Rev. Leinbach of Belmond, who attended the International S. S. Convention at Kansas City last June, will bring a message from there. He has spoken on the subject at three district S. S. conventions and brought an intensely interesting message each time. Rev. Muhleman of Eagle Grove, will speak on week-day schools of Belgium.

There will be the wonderful inspiration of learning how the work is carried on in other places. There will be special music. Altogether it will be a series of meetings that no one who has the least interest in children and in Sunday school work in general can afford to miss.

ASPARAGUS PRODUCES EARLY

A hardy and useful vegetable which should find a prominent place in the Iowa garden is asparagus, according to C. V. Holsinger, of the Extension Service at Iowa state College. When well established at the end of two or three years, asparagus will produce tender, edible shoots earlier in the spring than most any other garden crop.

Ordinarily the young shoots will be long enough to use by the first of April and may be cut off as fast as they grow until about the first of July. Shoots should not be cut after this time, says Mr. Holsinger, but the plants should be allowed to develop their tops, and in turn their roots.

Like other garden crops, asparagus may be started from the seed planted in rows but a bed is more often started with roots purchased or taken from an old bed. Planted at intervals of 18 or 20 inches in rows about 4 feet apart, and given reasonable care, Mr. Holsinger says the plants will live and produce from 10 to 20 years.

Asparagus is a thrifty garden crop and will stand a great deal of competition from other crops and weeds, but will respond readily to a treatment of well rotted barnyard manure each year. The best practice on the farm is to use a manure mulch. This tends to prevent rust and materially increases yields. In towns it is sometimes more convenient to use a mulch of leaves and supply the fertility by means of commercial fertilizers. Soil for asparagus should be spaded deeply, but should be fairly firm at time of planting.

The tips may be used either green or white, depending upon the taste of the housewife. The bleached tips may be obtained by mounding up the earth around the stems and then cutting the shoots for table use several inches beneath the surface. Popular varieties are Palmetto, Conover' Colossal and Washington Rust Proof.

WARP MEAT IN PAPER

"If cured meat is to be kept any length of time it should be wrapped in paper and placed in a tight paper bag," says H. D. Helser of the animal husbandry department of Iowa State College. "After this is done," he says, "the bags of meat should be hung up in a dry, dark, vermin-proof building until required for food. To protect the meat from skippers it is sometimes dusted with borax."

NEW LAW FOR EDUCATION

Schools have always empnastzed predominantly mental training to the neglect of physical and moral training. This is on the presumption that the latter phases of education would receive due attention in the home. Society and business have changed all this. The 40th General Assembly enacted the Physical Education Law to be effective September 1, 1924, which requires all children in the public schools unless excused for reason, to receive a mimimum of fifty minutes per week in physical training and health education. The state Superintendent of public instruction is authorized to outline a course of study for physical training for the schools.—Ex.

LICENSE ON DEAD DOG

Chester DeVeney, editor of the newspaper and postmaster at New Hartford, would not pay his dog tax this spring, and a few days ago Auditor Hilmer advised him by letter of the delinquency. Chester wrote back that the dog was dead and he did not feel like paying tax on a pup that had already gone to the happy hunting ground. The county auditor consulted County Attorney Doore, who rendered an opinion that in a case where the dog's alive January 15, then the tax was collectible. After being informed of the county attorney's opinion, Mr. DeVeny wrote the auditor as follows:

"I am enclosing herewith a one dollar bill as a contribution to the dead dog fund of Butler county. This fund must have been created to take care of the graves of the deceased dogs of the county and I trust it will be spent 'judiciously' on Decoration day. Old Nibbs was a bit unruly when a pup but the last days of his life were spent in living as near as possible to the teachings of the Golden Rule, I am therefore of the opinion that the deceased is spending eternity on the great white throne in the happy hunting ground I trust the county attorney will now see his way clear to allow Nibbs' ashes to rest in peace."

A SURPLUS FOR A CHANGE

For many years Americans have had an intimate acquaintance with the word "deficit" as applied to the federal government. Congress has made its annual appropriations, and governmental departments have proceeded to spend more than their allowances. A deficit has been the customary result. But perk up! They say every cloud has its silver lining, but this year it is to be a golden one, thanks to our national budget system.

From whence does this good news come? From General Lord, director of the budget—the man who ought to know. The general tells us that at the end of the present fiscal year there will be in the federal treasury a surplus of sixty millions of dollars over expenditures for the period.

Of course, sixty millions are not much—only a bagatelle—but "surplus" sounds sweeter than "deficit," sixty million dollars sweeter. Long live the budget—and hasten the day when taxes will begin to fall.—Ex.

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Disliking the prospect of a month's visit to her austere aunt, Lady Erythea Lambe, at Jervaulx abbey, and her cousin, Alexander Lambe, Aimee, vivacious daughter of the Very Reverend Viscount Scroope, is in a rebellious mood.

CHAPTER II.—She wanders into the park, there encountering a strange youth in trouble with a motorcycle. He laughingly introduces himself as "Billy," American. The two cement the acquaintance by a ride on the motorcycle, the "Flying Sphinx," and part. With Georgina Berners, her cousin, Aimee sets out for Jervaulx. On the way she decides that Georgina shall impersonate her at Jervaulx, while she goes on a holiday. Georgina's horrified protest is unavailing.

CHAPTER III.—Happy in her new freedom, Aimee again meets "Billy." He tells her his name is Spencer, and she gives hers as Amy Snooks, at present "out of a job." Billy offers to take her into partnership in selling the Sphinx. In a spirit of madcap adventure, she accepts. The two proceed to the town of Stanhoe, taking separate lodgings in Ivy cottage.

CHAPTER IV.—That night Aimee visits Georgina and learns that the deception has not been discovered. By her dominant personality she compels Georgina to continue the subterfuge.

CHAPTER V.—On a trial spin next day on the Sphinx, with Billy, Aimee almost collides with a carriage in which are her aunt, Georgina and Alexander. The pair escape unrecognized.

CHAPTER VI.—Georgina learns that Lord Scroope is coming to visit Lady Erythea and, realizing what will happen on his arrival, is in hopeless bewilderment.

CHAPTER VII.—While Aimee is secretly visiting Georgina at Jervaulx, the place is burglarized. Aimee escapes.

CHAPTER VIII.—Georgina learns, with much relief, that Aimee has got away.

CHAPTER IX.—Police Inspector Panke decides that the robbery is the work of "Jack the Climber" and "Calamity Kate," noted thieves, who travel on a motorcycle.

CHAPTER X.—Billy, aware of his "partner's" nocturnal jaunts, is troubled. He follows her, on the Sphinx, to Jervaulx. He hears the commotion, at once suspects burglary, and follows two figures on a motorcycle who are apparently in a desperate hurry. Cornering the pair, Billy knocks out a man who attempts to shoot him, picking up a package the fellow had dropped. He discovers the other fugitive to be a woman. Stopping to aid her, she strikes him with a stone, rendering him unconscious, and the pair escape.

Clearly the partner had made a midnight excursion for a very definite object; people do not roam the countryside in the small hours for nothing.

The incident of the carriage on the Stanhoe road puzzled Billy; he had mentioned the carriage casually to Mrs. Sunning—saying nothing about the collision—and learned that it could belong to none other than Lady Erythea of Jervaulx abbey. He was told a good deal about that establishment. It was easier to start Mrs. Sunning talking than to stop her.

Obviously, Amy had something to fear from Jervaulx; something that bound her to secrecy, and led her to run risks. It annoyed Billy that she should have anything to fear whatever.

"Sometimes," said Billy to himself, as the lodge gates of Jervaulx came in sight, "a broncho filly with the spring blood in her will get doin' stunts an' galloping among the gopher holes. When they do that they're liable to fall an' break a cannon-bone. It's the same with her. If she doesn't want me, why she doesn't. But if she does, I'm going to be right there."

He dismounted some little distance short of the park entrance. The dark pile of the abbey was visible, a quarter of a mile across the grasslands.

Billy paused and reflected. The journey could be nothing more than a scouting expedition. He wished very much that he had been closer on Aimee's tracks.

Just then he observed a light flash out in one of the abbey windows. Faint, tintinnabulatory sounds were borne to him upon the night breeze—the clanging of a bell.

He watched the house with alert and thoughtful eyes. In a few moments two dim figures became visible, moving swiftly. An imaginative onlooker might have thought them to be goblins, gamboling across the sward. But they kept an uncommonly straight line, crossing the park and heading for a point a few hundred yards to Billy's right. Two people—running swiftly.

Billy followed them with his eyes. The foremost was long-limbed, scudding along with giant strides. The other, close behind, moved no less swiftly, but it was a figure of vague outlines, apparently wearing a cloak or dust-coat. They vanished from sight against the park fence where the lane turned.

"If that ain't a hold-up," said Billy, starting away from the fence, "there never was one yet!"

He heard the cough and splutter of a starting motorcycle under tall trees far up the lane. For one moment he listened, then made a dash for the Sphinx.

"A get-away!" said Billy. "My job!"

He threw his leg over the Sphinx and whirred off round the corner. He lifted his chin and gave a joyous laugh, like the bay of a hound. The lust of the hunter was in his blood.

The rider ahead, already aware that he was being chased, let out his machine at breakneck speed. The ray from Billy's lamp showed him a man crouching low between the handlebars, his arms spread like the wings of a bat. On the pillion behind crouched a small, muffled figure.

"Give up!" shouted Billy, as he overtook them. "You can't make it. I've got you!"

A hand stretched out from the figure on the pillion, and emitted a barking flash of fire. It dazzled Billy for the moment. Something zipped through his hair; automatically his left hand tightened on the valve-lifter and the Sphinx slowed, allowing the other cycle to shoot ahead.

Billy made a lurid remark, and at once increased speed again to close with the fugitives. Right ahead the lane forked on to the main road, and thither the driver of the other cycle was obviously heading. But the lights of a car were in sight, approaching rapidly on the road. The rider of the cycle had evidently no ambition to meet it; at the last moment he swerved left and continued along the narrow lane.

Billy laughed aloud.

"The guy's cornered himself!" he thought. "He's taken the blind alley. Me for him!"

The lane was very rutty and uneven. The cycle ahead had vanished round a bend; Billy, shutting off his engine, swung round it immediately afterward. As he did so he heard a crash. The driver of the other cycle, realizing too late that he was in a cul-de-sac, had swerved, braked violently, and came thoroughly to grief.

Billy sprang from the Sphinx, letting her fall on her side with the headlight still glowing. The other cycle lay prostrate; a small heap was huddled beside it on the grass.

The taller man, the driver, was just staggering to his feet when Billy ran at him. The cyclist whipped out a repeating pistol.

A gun, at night, and in the hands of a shaken man, is much less certain than a fist with six feet of activity behind it. Billy's left dashed the pistol hand aside, the bullet spat impotently into the air, and his right came with a terrific upper-cut beneath the man's chin, lifting him off his feet to fall inert.

As he came down, something skipped and rolled away from him along the grass, in the ray of the Sphinx's headlight. With the swift instinct for loot Billy pounced upon it—a sumptuous looking little case of leather, with a clasp. Billy thrust it in his pocket and turned to the fallen man, who lay with closed eyes and his head moving faintly from side to side.

"Mighty slow with a gun," said Billy, stooping over him. "I'm going over you for the rest of the goods, Bud."

A moan from the other malefactor, lying by the fallen cycle, interrupted him. So pathetic and treble a moan was it that Billy started and jerked himself upright, staring.

"Lordy!" he gasped, with remorse and concern. "It's a woman!"

The discovery was disconcerting enough. But a thought shot through his brain that nearly paralyzed Billy. What woman was it?

He hurried to her side. She had already raised herself on one hand and seemed trying feebly to get up. Billy stooped over her.

"Much hurt?" he stammered. "Here—"

At that moment the fallen driver recovered and stirred. Billy turned his head toward him, with a quick instinct—the danger lay closer at hand.

The woman's hand was grasping a stone, and, as Billy turned, she brought her arm round with a sweep, swift as a striking snake. The chunk of rock crashed full on the side of Billy's head. He fell as an ox falls, and lay still.

The woman staggered to her feet and ran to her prostrate companion.

"He's got his!" she panted. "You hurt, Jake?"

She helped the man to rise. He stood dazedly for a moment; the spinal jar from a knock-out under the point of the chin is terrific, but evanescent.

"Look lively an' beat it!" gasped the woman, hauling the motorcycle upright with surprising ease. "See if the bulgine'll run—we'll have the cops here next!"

"Got to settle with him!" said the man thickly, glancing at the prostrate Billy.

"He's all in, I tell you. Get her going!"

The man wrenched the motorcycle round, and fumbled at the feed and controls with nervous fingers. While he did so the woman snatched up another stone, and, running to the Sphinx, hammered on the engine and the levers. She had dealt three or four lusty strokes when the other motorcycle came spitting and wobbling past her. The woman ran to it and swung herself up deftly behind.

"Let her out. We'll clear yet!"

The motorcycle, coughing and missing fire badly, trundled back down the lane the way it had come. Jack the Climber leaned to the handle-bars, Calamity Kate, her arms tight round him, settled herself on the pillion. Together they whirred away into the darkness.

CHAPTER XI

Confession.

It was very dark and very quiet at the lane's end when Billy at last stirred, and, after an interval of slowly returning consciousness, managed to raise himself dizzily to a sitting position.

He pressed his hands to the side of his head and remained for awhile motionless, conscious of a damp warmth under his left palm. His eyes dwelt on a white, chalky stone, as big as a doubled fist, that lay on the grass beside him. Events began to reconnect themselves in a brain that still buzzed faintly.

"A granite skull," murmured Billy, not without a touch of pride, "isn't altogether a disadvantage in an argument."

He looked about him thoughtfully. Not far away something gleamed in a rut—a small repeating pistol. His late opponents had evidently left in too much of a hurry to take an inventory of their effects.

"She must have dropped that when the machine crashed," thought Billy. "She loosed it at me when I was riding up. Lucky for me she hadn't it just now. Some girl!"

He heaved himself to his feet unsteadily, made for a ditch where there was a glitter of water, and bathed the tender side of his head. The water revived him; save for a cut under his hair, no serious damage was done, though the blow might easily have cracked a weaker skull.

"I don't see that I shine much, over this job," said Billy despondently; "they sure handed it to me. Got right under my guard. Never thought of a woman sharing in a hold-up; an' yet I guess it's been done before."

He picked up the pistol, was about to pocket it, but altered his mind and flung it in the ditch. The other automatic was nowhere to be seen. Billy walked towards the Sphinx, the headlamp of which was now in darkness. His hand swung against a large lump projecting from the side of his coat. He halted and dragged out the leather case. Billy had forgotten its existence.

"Why, here's something saved from the wreck!" he exclaimed. "They couldn't have seen me get it!"

He dropped on one knee, opened the case, and switched the little electric torch over it.

Billy gave a stifled gasp. On a bed of cream silk velvet reposed a necklace of amethysts, ending in a loop of nine superb emeralds that shone with changing green fires under the torch's glow. Billy was not an expert in gems, but he guessed that these were such as a prince might be proud to own.

"This is the darnedest game I ever was up against," he said dazedly, returning the case carefully to his pocket.

He made a rapid examination of the Sphinx, and at once became aware of Calamity Kate's handiwork. In spite of the best intentions, however, that enterprising lady had overestimated the vulnerability both of Billy's skull and his motorcycle. She had done some damage, but had missed the more vital parts of the Sphinx. After ten minutes' work Billy's capable hands restored the machine to fair running order, and he rode away down the lane. Both lamps were out of action.

Any further pursuit of the thieves he put aside as a useless proposition. He had a vague idea that they had gone hours ago; in fact, however, he had not been unconscious more than a few minutes.

"There's only one thing to do," said Billy, "an' that's—"

A disconcerting thought flashed through his mind. The bumping of the jewel-case against his side suggested it.

"Gee!" he murmured, "I'm Little Boy Blue, all right. But if I was to run against the cops now, it'd take a heap of explanation before they slugged me. My story'd look pretty thin. Jewel-case—motorbike—it only wants one item to complete the outfit!"

He turned on to the high road, rapidly resolving on a plan of action as he rode. It was a good plan, but a few moments later it was hopelessly upset again. He was, as it happened, nearer to Stanhoe than to Jervaulx abbey, and as he turned in the direction of the latter Billy became aware of someone running toward him along the road—a dark figure, with a peculiar moving gleam of whiteness about it. He stopped the Sphinx immediately and thrust out his feet to steady himself.

The dark figure checked in its stride, hesitated, and seemed about to bolt back again.

"Partner!" cried Billy in amazement. "Is that you?"

The reply was a wild gasp. Aimee, breathless, muddy, with an appreciable breadth of white cambric showing at the base of her skirt, rushed up to him and seized his arm.

"Billy! Oh, I'm so glad—I'm so glad!" she panted. "Billy, I—I'm in an awful mess! The absolute limit!"

"How! Why?"

"I was in a house—and it was burgled"—gulped Aimee, struggling for breath "they thought it was me—and I scooted—they're chasing me."

It was not a vividly lucid explanation. But Billy's intelligence department connected with it at once; it supplied the missing factors. Before he could answer, a pair of lights flashed into view far down the road, approaching at speed.

"Car!" exclaimed Aimee, and with a note of panic—"Billy, suppose it's police? If so, they'll be looking for me!" She made a dash for the pillion of the Sphinx. "Get me out of this, Billy—start her quick!"

"Not on your life!" said Billy swiftly. "That's the last thing on earth for you now. Come with me."

He ran back fifty yards along the road to a field gate. In a few moments he had it open, thrust the Sphinx through, let her fall behind the hedge, and dragged Aimee with him into the ditch. They had hardly gained that cover when the car swept by with a roar, showing a glimpse of police helmets scudding past the low rampart of thorn fence. The majesty of law and order, sweeping inexorably through the night. A rattle, a hoot, and it was gone.

In the ditch there was painful silence. Billy mechanically felt his bulging pocket, glanced for a moment at the Sphinx, and then stared blankly at Aimee.

"Close call, partner," he observed.

"I thought it must be they," said Aimee breathlessly. "I wonder they haven't called out the military as well. All the countryside seems to be chasing me! Billy!" she said, with a suspicious tremble in her voice, "you'll help me, won't you? I'll tell you about it. I—I've kept it from you, but I won't any longer. I—"

Billy laid a hand on her arm.

"Amy," he said quietly, "just repeat this piece to yourself. Say: 'I'm safe, my partner's lookin' after me.' Got that? I'll see you through; you've nothin' to worry for at all. But we can't talk here. We've got to beat it."

He picked up the Sphinx.

"Follow close after me, an' keep quiet."

He wheeled the machine along the field path at a run, passed through another gate, crossed a stretch of heathery common-land, and made for a small copse at the foot of the slope. Aimee trotted behind silently, with an odd sense of relief and security. Billy would see it through. He had said so. He halted by the copse, and looked round to make sure of his bearings.

"It ought to be close handy here," he said. "Yes—I've got it."

He pushed on to a small bosky dell which led into a series of old clay-pits, masked with brambles. Aimee wondered how he could find his way so confidently in the dark; she had not the remotest idea where she was.

"Wait here a minute. I'll come back for you," said Billy.

He wheeled the Sphinx away along a scarcely visible path, and presently returned without it.

"I was fooling around here on an off day, first time I came to Stanhoe," he said, "an' I lit on something that's goin' to be mighty useful. The old Sphinx has got to disappear for a bit, an' you'll soon understand why. Follow behind; there's only room for one at a time."

He led the way through the brambles and, pressing ahead, turned on the light of his pocket torch cautiously. Aimee, close at his heels, presently found herself in the entrance of a sandy cave with a very small mouth, screened by rough creeper and brush.

"There's several of these around here," said Billy, "but this is one you don't find unless you hunt for it with a sounding pole. It's a heap quieter spot than the high roads tonight. Suppose we sit down."

They seated themselves on the powdered crag in the cave's mouth.

"It's time to show down our hands, partner," said Billy. "Do you mind putting me wise? Don't leave anything out. I want the facts."

Aimee was silent some moments. She found it difficult to begin.

"It was like this, Billy."

She plunged into the tale, and went through it from beginning to end—leaving out nothing. It took some time. She could hardly see Billy in the gloom. He made no comments; he was so silent that sometimes she wondered if he was there. Billy was, for a time, too flabbergasted to speak.

At the finish, she heard a stifled, grunting noise, a sense of something shaking. It seemed to touch a spring in Aimee. She bowed her head on her knees and laughed till her cheeks were wet.

"Haven't I torn it!" she moaned. "And I downed Cousin Alexander—and the butler's got yards of my skirt!"

Billy wiped his eyes with his sleeves.

"An' you can laugh," he said, with intense delight, "after all that! Gee, but you're the stuff! Sand right through. You're all right. As long as you can laugh, the Red Gods'll stand by you! An' so will I. I'm one of 'em."

"Billy! There's nothing but you between me and those beastly police. But I'll bet it's enough. What's to be done?"

"Hear my side of it!" said Billy, dropping on his knees and producing the jewel case. "Here's the first item!"

He opened the case and shone the torch upon it. Aimee gave a little cry. Billy explained briefly how he had come by the gems. He said little about the struggle; that ... was as sore as the side of his head. The best of us have our pride.

"One of them knocked me out for a spell, and like a fool I let 'em get away," he said. "I guess I didn't get all the goods, but this looks like an ace flush to me."

"How splendid you are!" cried Aimee, a catch in her voice. "Why, those will be the Lambe emeralds. I've heard of them—everybody has. They belong to my Aunt Erythea!"

"Then I shouldn't wonder if they scooped the jack-pot. But there's some high cards out against us. See here. We had to run for it. Here's the police prancin' over the country after a man and a woman on a motorcycle—for I guess they must be wise to it. Here's me with the stuff in my pocket, and you with a dress sample in the hands of the sleuth-hounds. Been the station-house for ours, if they'd got us just now—an' there'd be too much explaining to do. We'd have hit the cells for the night, sure. No place for you, partner. And all the newspapers spreading themselves over it."

"I know. It's f-fearful!"

"Not a bit!" cried Billy. "For now you can get in ahead of the cops. Don't you see? Put your folks wise to it—lay down all your cards. You're Lord Scroope's daughter—you ain't a burglar. Give it them straight. I'll stand by an' see you through."

"But—I can't, Billy! It'll all have to come out, then. Every bit of it," said Aimee with a gasp.

"Why, of course it will! It was bound to come out anyway, soon or late. You didn't think you could keep up this Jervaulx racket? I don't see any way you could do that. But you can keep it in the family. You've got to face the music."

There was a long pause.

"I—can't," said Aimee, scarcely audibly.

Billy was amazed. If it had not been so dark—and an incredible supposition in any case—he would have supposed from her voice that she was crying.

"You aren't afraid?" he said wonderingly.

"Of a row? No! It isn't that."

Billy sat down beside her.

"What is it then, partner?" he said gently.

"I never thought of it—till Georgie told me," said Aimee in stifled tones.

"Told you what?" he answered quietly. "What's the trouble?"

"About staying there. I—Ivy cottage!"

Billy moved slightly.

"I—I don't quite get you," he said.

"I can't tell Dad!" Aimee put her hands over her eyes and burst into tears. "I daren't! Billy, what am I to do!"

CHAPTER XII

A Gambler's Chance.

Billy stared straight before him. When at last he found his voice, it had so dazed a tone that Aimee hardly recognized it. He laid a hand on her shoulder.

"This thing's got me guessing," said Billy slowly. "I—I don't know what—"

"Of course, you never thought twice about it. And no more did I!" said Aimee. "I didn't care! And I don't care now! or I wouldn't if it wasn't for Dad. But people—it's all this miserable sentiment — that's what's wrong."

"Yes?" said Billy dizzily. "Well—"

"And now—why, the police are looking for a man and woman on a motorcycle, and they'll find out we were at Ivy cottage. They'll get my description. And even when they find out who I really am"—

Billy drew in his breath sharply.

"Georgie told me it was my finish—even before this silly burglary happened," continued Aimee gloomily. "Georgie knows about these sort of things. It isn't the burglary that matters. I could get over that. It's this—this other thing."

Billy was silent.

"The idea is," continued Aimee, with the same remarkable calm, "that I've lost my character; like a housemaid that's been stealing, or a groom caught selling the corn. Only I haven't been caught—yet.

"But—if Dad knew! You don't know my father, Billy. I couldn't explain him to you. Dad is just about the dearest thing that ever lived—in his way. But he belongs to a time about two hundred years back. Mother would understand; but not Dad. It's his creed that a girl mustn't be even—suspected. It was only tonight Georgina told me this thing would—well, it would break his heart. And I know him; I see she's right. If you and I—"

"Stop!" said Billy hoarsely. "Don't say any more. I—I've got to think this thing out."

Aimee found that he had suddenly left her. Presently she became aware of the outlines of his big figure, standing motionless just outside the cave. He was there quite a long time. Aimee sat where she was, twisting her handkerchief between her fingers. She felt very much calmer. The trouble and the stress were now with Billy.

He came back, and stood over her.

"I'm a coyote," he said quietly. "What I need is a quirt laid across me. I've been a fool."

"Not a bit!" said Aimee quickly. "How should you know?"

"It was my business to know! There isn't any excuse. But—things are so different, where I come from. And I don't know anything about women. We think a lot of women, down my way, but we don't talk about them—much. Partner, this thing I've let you in for through my foolishness—it's broken me all up."

"Because I'm Lord Scroope's daughter?"

"No!" said Billy shortly. "Be the same if you were his housemaid. But it's up to me to see you clear—you and him, too. And I'll do it."

His voice was so confident that Aimee's trouble fell away from her, as a sun-ripened chestnut sheds its prickly husk.

"What are we to do then, Billy?"

"It seems to me," said Billy gently, "that the simplest way is the best way. Let's you an' me go to the old man. No use talkin' about it here. I'll put it straight for you, partner."

"No!"

"I hope I can make him see sense—even if he's two hundred years old, as you say. It's all my fault. It isn't yours—not one scrap of it. I won't say much—but come right along with me to your father now—an' leave the talking to me."

Aimee rose.

"Never! I won't have it, Billy!" she said desperately. "I don't know—I don't know what you might say. If it comes out I'm done for anyhow; I'm going to take the chance that it won't! There must be a way to stop it—there must be some way.

"It's my trouble—mine! And I won't have it given away."

Billy drew a quick breath and straightened himself.

"Right!" he said. "Those are the orders. I accept them. I s'pose a man can't give away a girl's secret, if she wants it kept. I know that much."

"Why, of course," said Aimee simply. "But will you please understand, Billy, that I'm not going to drag you into this. The best thing you can do is to get away out of it all. I shall manage all right. I don't want to—"

"Cut that out," said Billy very quietly. "It don't go." There was a pause. "I did think, for a while, it might be best—for you. But that's wrong. I've got to be right on hand, for I'll be wanted. Now hold on while I tell you what we've got to do."

"Yes?" said Aimee eagerly.

Billy stretched out a long arm, plucked a leaf from the bramble that screened the cave, and chewed it pensively.

"There's just a gambler's chance," he said at last. "It's pretty thin—like drawing to a three-card flush. But it's wonderful how they come off sometimes, if you back your luck, good an' full."

He flashed the torch round the walls of the cave.

"What d'you think of this place?"

"It's—snug."

"Snug!" echoed Billy admiringly. "That's you! It would give some women fits. But you've sand. Do you think," he added diffidently, "that you could make out here for a bit? Could you sleep here?"

"Certainly I could. Why, they'll never find me—!"

"Come up here," said Billy, leading the way along the cave, which turned in a long curve, narrowing to a very small space. At the end stood the Sphinx.

"She'll have to stay here, too. There's a bit of risk to that—but very little. We can't help it. In the pannier-case you'll find iron rations, a can-opener, biscuits, an' chocolate. I always carry those. Down the pit yonder, just by the alder bush, is a spring of water. That settles supplies.

"Now, the first deal is to keep you right out of the way. For a few hours, perhaps for a day or more—I can't say how long. But we've got to put up a bluff. And you'll be at least as safe here as anywhere in the British isles.

"Our best chance is that the police may get the bracelets onto the real thieves right away. I'm not much stuck on that chance. Police, wherever you strike 'em, are—well, they're just police. We're in a lot more danger from them than that dead-beat who broke into Jervaulx, and the female rattlesnake he had along. The police mustn't get you, at any price. And—they mustn't get me either. Only there's more to it than that. Half a hundred things. There's a mighty tangled deal in front of me.

"Now, I'm going to sail right in. All you've got to do is lie here in this cache till about seven or eight o'clock. I'll be back here by then. If I'm not," said Billy quietly, "it'll be because I've fallen through. You bet your life I won't. But—if I don't get here by then, you must throw your hand in, just get straight to your father, best way you can. Do you promise that?"

"Y-yes! But tell me what you're going to do, Billy!" she said breathlessly.

"I can't tell you anything. I'll have to play the hand as it's dealt me; it just depends how the cards fall. And don't you worry any!" he said earnestly. "If you get doubtful or scary, just wash it right out of your mind, an' say this: 'Billy's running the thing for me, an' he'll see me through!' I'm off. Shake!"

With a sudden gesture Aimee put both her hands in his. He gave them a crushing grip, and broke into the sunniest smile.

"We sure are seein' life, partner!" he chuckled.

Aimee replied with a rather tremulous laugh. The next moment Billy had dropped her hands, and was gone.

Once clear of the crag-pits, Billy made for the road by another route. While climbing a gate he glanced at the luminous dial of his wrist watch, and emitted a whistle of consternation. Aimee's account of herself was absorbing, but he did not realize till now what an unconscionable time they had spent in the cave. The night was nearing its close.

The program was begun by a song by the Junior class. The Senior class prophecy was given by Alfred Wilkinon. Following the prophecy a very clever comedy entitled "An Easy Mark" was given by members of the Junior class. This play was very well given and furnished a delightful amusement. It represented a good deal of work and the parts were exceedingly well taken.

Cecil Riley, the Senior class president, read the class will and presented the ladder bearing the crimson and gray to the Junior class.

The evening's entertainment was closed by the singing of the high school song.

This was one of the very best banquets ever given in Belmond high school and the Senior class wish to express their appreciation and enjoyment of the entertainment.

A great deal of the credit for the success of the banquet should be given Miss Jewell and those who worked on committees.—A Senior.

Start New Building For Postoffice

Chas. N. Reese To Erect New Double Building On Hard ware Lots.

TO BE READY BY SEPT. 1ST.

Chas. Reese began work Tuesday on the construction of the new building to house the post office. This new building, to be located on the two lots formerly occupied by the Townsan Hardware, which was destroyed in the big fire, will be 43 x 70 and of hollow clay block with brick underling construction. The building will be a double one, of one story, and the post office will occupy one part while the other will be for store or business use. The post office will be moved, it is understood, about the first of September, the new building to be ready by that time. The erection of this new modern building on the site of the old store will add immensely to the appearance of the business section of town, particularly the west end of Main street.

K. K. K. BURN CROSS AT BRITT

The firy cross, emblem of the Ku Klux Klan, was burned at Britt on Saturday. The cross which was constructed similar to those which have been burned in other towns around here, was placed at the south end of Main street near the greenhouse. Considerable literature in regard to the Ku Klux Klan had been placed by the cross and was taken by those who wished it. There are many different opinions as to just what the burning crossing signifies, but no one is real sure. A number of Kanawha citizens who were at Britt saw the cross burning and some of the literature was secured.—Reporter.

Soldiers To Encamp In Belmond June 23

Three Hundred Men From Ft. Snelling To Be In Belmond On That Date.

ENROUTE TO DES MOINES

Three hundred United States soldiers will be encamped in Belmond on the 23rd of June. They will be the second battalion of the Third Infantry, from Fort Snelling, Minnesota, enroute to Des Moines, overland.

Mayor Sullivan received the following letter last week:

"The second battalion, Third Infantry, consisting of approximately 11 officers and 300 enlisted men, will march overland from Fort Snelling, Minnesota, to Fort Des Moines, Ia., during June, 1923. It is contemplated marching thru your city if suitable arrangements can be made for camping over night. Our probable date of arrival is June 23. We will have about 50 animals.

E. A. Lathrop, Major 3rd Inf.

Mayor Sullivan states that he is arranging quarters for the troops while here, along the river, south of town where they will be close to a hydrant for drinking water and where the men can bath. The soldiers will be quite a sight, and you should keep the date in mind and oe in Belmond June 23 to see what a real fighting outfit looks like.

FORMER RESIDENT KILLS BIG TIMBER WOLF

The following item taken from the Grand Rapids (Mich.), Herald-Review, concerns the son of a former resident of this vicinity, C. W. Jennings:

"Claude B. Jennings, who lives on the Gravelle farm south of town, had an experience Saturday with the first hungry wolf that has been known in this section. Mr. Jennings saw the animal, which was a large timber wolf, in his pasture making toward some calves. He looked up his shotgun, but didn't have any shells, and sent to a neighboring farm for some. In the meantime the wolf kept circling around him and the animals until the ammunition arrived, and one shot disabled the animal so that when it tried to escape and jump a fence it was unable to make its getaway. It was finally driven down to a small swamp and at a good opportunity was shot and killed. The wolf was one of the largest that had been seen in this section for some time and it was evidently of the real timber variety. It was said to have weighed well over a hundred pounds, and the animal, instead of doing Mr. Jennings any harm, added considerable to his income for the day, for he received $22.50 bounty.

SAFETY FIRST CAMPAIGN

Commencing June 1st, and continuing until September 30th, the railroads of the United States and Canada will carry on the campaign to prevent accidents at railroad highway grade crossings which was inaugurated by the American Railway Association and handled by the railroads of the United States during the same months of 1922.

The campaign is to be styled "Careful Crossing Campaign" and the slogan appearing on the posters and to be used generally is "Cross Crossings Cautiously."

The increase of 24 per cent in the registration of automobiles and automobile trucks during the year 1922 bringing the number up to 12,975,632 together with the fact that during the last five years 9,101 persons were killed and 24,208 persons injured in railroad grade crossing accidents in the United States, emphasizes the need of carrying on the campaign this year with even greater effort than was put forth last year, if that be possible.

Railroad men will do their full part and if the owners, drivers and occupants of automobiles will but do their fair share when approaching and crossing railroad tracks—be assured that the way is clear before they attempt to cross, and take no chances, life and limb will no longer be needlessly sacrified at railroad highway grade crossings; misery and suffering will be materially reduced; homes and families will experience greater happiness and better conditions will generally prevail.

ALGONAS' NEW PARKING LAW

Algona has changed their parking rules and henceforth will have the cars parked alongside the curb. You must not head in or back in up there any more. The streets are too narrow to allow the parking in any other way. Under the new way, a block will hold only about thirty cars, and residential districts will see many cars parked there on busy days.

HE OUGHT TO BE CURTEOUS

A squabble seems to be going on between a lady from Livermore and a gentleman from LuVerne as to the boundary lines on their own particular hootch territory. Concerning this dispute the News of LuVerne says:

"The Algona Advance of last week contained an item relative to some hootch makers whom the officials had captured and mentioned a 'certain lady' from Livermore. No one in LuVerne wonders who that certain lady is, for she has been peddling hootch here for a long time, but has mighty stiff competition in a local hootch seller, who is fast breaking into her territory. The town councils of Livermore and LuVerne should get together, and give each one his or her territory, so that they will not conflict. Too bad our local booze seller is not gallant enough to leave that lady's territory and customers alone."

ACHIEVEMENT IN RADIO

The latest achievement in radio was the capture of Clayton Crawford former bandmaster of Pella, who left several parties in the lurch when he disappeared some weeks ago and no clue could be obtained as to his whereabouts. A radio enthusiast at Pella was listening in when a musical number was announced at Austin, Texas. It was an accordian number to be played by Clayton Crawford, and when that name was announced the authorities at Austin were instructed by telegraph to arrest the musician and this was done. He is wanted in Dallas county for obtaining money by false pretense, and in Des Moines for burglary.—Ex.

GOLDFIELD BOYS ROLLIN' THE BONES ARE CAUGHT

The Goldfield Chronicle of last week reported that a deputy sheriff came to that town and took into camp some of the youngsters of the city who had been engaged in African golf, or in other words, shooting craps. The boys, it seems, had their headquarters in the park, and the deputy relieved them of their chief articles of warfare.

Earl Madsen Dies After Long Illness

One Of Belmond's Finest Young Men Dies After Making Long Brave Fight.

COMMUNITY IS GRIEVED

Perhaps this community has never been more genuinely grieved than last Tuesday, when word was received of the death at Rochester of Earl Madsen. Earl had undergone his second operation that day for tumor on the brain, and failed to recover.

For several years Earl had suffered from some malady, which it did not seem able to treat successfully. He had gone to Rochester for examination, where his ailment was finally pronounced brain tumor, and one unsuccessful operation performed Owing to his weakened condition he could not stand the second operation until two weeks later, and during the second operation he quietly passed away.

Earl had lived a life of which we are all proud. The writer knew him and was friends with him from early boyhood, and we never knew a finer man. He was a gentleman in every sense, loyal and true and his life was always an [illegible] for the rest of us to pattern after. In all his illness he never complained, never gave up hope or lost his cheerfulness, and to the last maintained his optimistic view. Earl numbered his friends by the people he met, and to the wife and two little children their deepest, warmest sympathy goes out in heartfelt measure

Funeral services were held Saturday, June 2, at the house at two o'clock, and at the Congregational church at two-thirty, with Rev. Leinbach assisted by Rev. Wilkinson in charge. Interment was in Franklin Grove cemetery. Rev. Leinbach read the following obituary:

Earl Luarits Madsen, oldest son of M. C. and Mary Madsen, was born at Belmond, Iowa, March 10, 1891, and died at Rochester, Minnesota, May 30, 1923. Earl received his education in our Belmond school, and graduated in the class of 1910. He was married to Louise Brown Knox on August 17, 1916, and to this union two children were born, Keith Knox and Earline Louise.

Earl professed faith in Christ when he was about 12 years old, and joined the Methodist church, which membership he transfered to the Congregational church in order to be with his wife. He was always a true gentleman and his life was a living epistle for righteousness.

He joined King Solomon Lodge No. 110, A. F. & A. M. when he was 21 years old, and had received every honor that the lodge could confer upon him.

Besides his wife and children, he leaves his parents, three sisters, Mrs S. C. McBride of Casper, Wyoming, Mrs. Geo. Peterson of Belmond, and Mrs. J. C. Padelford of Glendale, Calif., and one brother, Irving C. Madsen, of Belmond.

IOWA FALLS TO HAVE NEW TOWN HALL—MAYBE

Iowa Falls may have a new town hall—maybe. The proposal to issue bonds to build a modern community building in which to hold all public activities and to house the city affairs as well, was put up at a special election last week and carried by the exceedingly narrow margin of five or six votes. The narrow margin has raised some fine legal points which have been submitted to a bond house and an opinion will be rendered by its attorneys. The board, in canvassing the vote, threw out 17 disputted ballots, but if the 17 votes that were not considered are counted in, the result would still be a few in favor, the disputted votes being about equally divided. The summary of the board gives 594 for and 588 against the issue. The bond issue is for $58,000.

E. N. Ericson, residing west of town, suffered a stroke of paralysis last Wednesday. He has been quite ill. Nora Nelson from Belmond is the nurse in charge.

THE FIGHT BEGINS

With the signing of the repeal of the prohibition law of New York, by Governor Smith, the big fight on prohibition has started

That sooner or later the booze advocates and manufacturers would begin the real battle against prohibition has been the concensus of opinion. Having their forces at last, so they believe, lined up, the booze manufacturers are ready for the show down. Governor Smith has been used as the advance guard, to fire the first shot.

The plea for light wines and beer fools no one. The plea that they do not want the strong stuff, but only the social drinks, is as false on the face of it as their own tongues. We all know that light wines and beer are but the beginning, the opening, and that whiskey will follow as a matter of course. Give them an inch and they will take a mile—aim and expect to take a mile.

It is to be open warfare at last. Fighting desperately in secret, preparing and waiting for the day, the booze hounds seem ready at last to force the issue. Governor Smith has made booze an issue for the next presidential campaign, and in doing it has saddled his party with a load which is going to break the donkey's back.

It is the beginning of the end for one side or the other. Let it come! Prohibition has been slammed and ridiculed and hooted from one end of the country to the other by those who made, peddled and drank booze. Prohibition has been in force long enough so that most people have formed an idea as to whether it pays or not. Let the fight come, and see exactly where the country stands on the question. Because prohibition is working and has worked, the booze gang are getting desperate; to them the future only gets darker and darker. Personal liberty, states' rights, and the hundred and one other arguments they have advanced, have seemingly not been able to put a stop to the success of prohibition. They must at last come out in the open and fight on their own feet for flatly, frankly, Booze.

The 18th amendment is here to stay. It was one of the greatest and best laws that this country has ever enacted. All the rum nounds, all the booze manufacturers, and all the Governor Smiths in America can never repeal it. Prohibition is here to stay.

Are they doing well---as well as you would like? Are they getting the necessary mineral in their rations?

Completion of the mineral feeding experiments at the Iowa Agricultural Experiment Station show that all the hogs which were fed minerals in their rations made better gains than the hogs in the check lots fed only on a cornbelt ration. The experiment also showed that the pigs fed minerals made quicker gains and were in better shape physically than the no mineral pigs.

FARM BUREAU NOTES

Treasurer Patton to Chicago.

E. A. Patton of Dows, Blaine township, treasurer of the Wright county Farm Bureau, was called to Chicago last week by the American Farm Bureau federation as a representative from Iowa to the national poultry produce marketing conference which was held at the Sherman Hotel, May 28th, under the auspices of the American Farm Bureau federation.

The purpose of this conference was for the organization of a national Poultry Produce Marketing association to bring about a state and national cooperative marketing agency for our poultry products particularly the marketing of eggs from our farms.

Aaron Sapiro, counsel on cooperative marketing for the American Farm Bureau federation, and Mr. Pcteet, in charge of the marketing department of the American Farm Bureau federation, were in charge of the meeting.

After the discussion of plans for organization, an executive committee was appointed to have charge of all organization work thruout the states of the middle west. Mr. Patton has been appointed a member of the executive committee and will no doubt, be expected to give considerable time to the organization work. The committee plans to place organizations in different states to organize units in the communities where sufficient interest is in the egg marketing work to warrant a local unit.

Blaine Township Meeting.

The regular monthly meeting of the Blaine township Farm Bureau was held at the Center school last Thursday evening, when about fifty interested farmers, their wives and children of that community assembled for a social and business meeting.

Director T. P. Simpson, who was in charge of the meeting, gave a short talk which was followed by a short program arranged by Mrs. J. C. Norris, vice director of the township farm bureau. The business session of the meeting was then held, after which a short address was given by the county agent.

Plans were laid at this time for holding the Blaine township Farm Bureau picnic on June 22nd. A committee consisting of Clarence Hill, chairman, Mrs. J. C. Norris, S. D. Hinckley, C. W. Ballou and Frank Toyne was appointed to have full charge of all arrangements for the township picnic which will be held at the Dows community park.

Attend Shipping Conference.

A livestock shipping association conference was held at Mason City Thursday evening, May 31st, for the officers, directors and managers of the various associations in that territory. The conference was called by Knute Espe, secretary of the State Livestock Shippers association. Fifteen shipping associations including representatives from Wright, Hancock, Franklin, Worth and Cerro Gordo counties were in attendance at this meeting.

The Clarion Livestock Shipping association was represented by president Barney Benson, Secretary Jay Tice, Director Matt Clark, manager E. W. Campbell and assistant manager John Doctor. This meeting was called for the purpose of having a general round table discussion on all problems which are common to the shipping association work. The local men who attended this meeting report that a lively meeting filled with valuable discussions was held at Mason City.

Lake Farmers Planning Picnic

Farmers of Lake township are organizing their work and making all plans towards a community picnic for June 26th which is to be held at the M. L. Clark home on the J. Mack farm five miles northwest of Clarion.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Lake township Farm Bureau which was held last Tuesday evening, plans were made for this community picnic. A program committee consisting of Mrs. Art Duitscher, chairman Marion Breckenridge, (music), Ross Farmer (sports), Art Duitscher (grounds), S. W. Witzel (stands), was anpointed by Director Clarence McBride to have charge of all organization work in connection with this township picnic.

The committee has planned to hold a joint picnic with the view of giving a special invitation to the teachers and pupils of the different schools of the township to attend this township picnic. Our county superintendent, Miss Bock, has been invited to appear on the program to speak in behalf of the schools of the township. Reverend Tomkinson of the Congregational church of Clarion has been invited to give the address of the occasion.

Coverdale At County Picnic.

John W. Coverdale, secretary of the American Farm Bureau federation with headquarters at Chicago, has been secured as the speaker of the day for the county wide picnic-club exhibit which is being planned for August 22nd.

It will be remembered that Mr. Coverdale was at one time the state leader of county agents in Iowa and from that position he went to Des Moines as the secretary of the Iowa Farm Bureau federation and was later elected to the office of secretary of the American Farm Bureau federation at Chicago. Mr. Coverdale is a big man and is known thruout the entire United States and the people of Wright county should consider themselves very fortunate in being able to secure the services of such a prominent man to appear on their program next August.

At the last regular meeting of the board of directors of the county Farm Bureau, plans were organized for holding a joint Farm Bureau picnic-club exhibit on August 22nd. A committee consisting of Harry Poundstone, chairman, Mrs. Harry Woodley, and Will Tillman was appointed to have charge of all plans for the picnic. The committee has decided to hold the picnic in one of the towns of the county where the most suitable accomodations for taking care of the crowd and providing for the care of the livestock can be furnished. Most towns of our county have community parks and the only question in the minds of the committee is to be able to find a place where the livestock exhibits of the boys' and girls' clubs can be cared for.

Elevator Short Course to be Held.

Officers and managers of farmers elevator companies will meet for a two day short course at the Commercial club rooms Fort Dodge, June 19 and 20. This course will be held by the agriculture economics section of the Iowa State College Extension service co-operating with farmers' elevator officials and county Farm Bureaus. The program will include grain grading, accounting problems, and round table discussion of management and cooperative organization topics. Officers and managers who desire to register may secure a blank from the county agent.

All officers, directors and managers of the farmers' elevators of Wright county have received a special invitation from our local county agent to attend this conference at Fort Dodge. The short course for elevator managers and officers held at Iowa Falls a short time ago was a great success and there is no doubt but what a great many from Wright county will attend the Fort Dodge conference.

MEMORIAL DAY OBSERVED

Those who had charge of the Memorial Day exercises felt well repaid for their efforts in trying to make it a success. In spite of the conditions of the roads, there was a splendid turn-out, who felt well repaid for having come. The address by Attorney Leonard Raecker, from Waverly, was full of fire and patriotism, and held the audience spell bound. He spoke emphatically of the need of being a good citizen and brought out the qualities which are necessary to make desirable citizens —honesty to oneself and to ones fellowmen being the outstanding virtue. He appealed to his listeners to observe all laws without question, as we all have the privilege to elect people who make the laws. He did not, however, condemn honest criticism but urged us not to criticise unless we could improve conditions. The committee congratulates themselves for having been so fortnate as to have secured Mr. Raecker to give the address, and we hope to be able to have him in our midst again on a similar occasion in the future.

THE COUNTRY NEWSPAPER

Britt News: Many country town business men feel rather sore about the amount of trade which in many places leaves the home stores and goes to more or less distant cities. Yet if they would use the same principle of advetising as the result of which these big city stores develope a great trade, they would hold a large part of the customers who now go elsewhere for a lot of stuff. Human nature is about the same everywhere. If the big city stores have gone on to their wealth and marvelous expansion thru advertising, it is not likely that advertising will fail to help the country town merchant. If the people of a town or neighborhood are failing to support the home stores as they should the merchants as with the people. Very likely some of them are not showing the enterprise they ought to in the trouble is as likely to be with the matter of advertising.

Every page and column of the home newspaper is thoroly sconned People do not want to miss a single thing that has happened in their own neighborhood. Where a big city newspaper is hastily skimmed and only a small part of the matter can be noted because of the enormous size of the publication, the home paper is not so big but that it can be thoroly studied. As a consequence, wherever the merchant puts his notice it is bound to be read for two reasons. First because it is next to interesting news; second, because the people are just as much interested in the things that their home stores are doing, as in the things that the local societies or people are up to When people read the advertising of a store it won't be long before they will call to see what the stuff looks like. The town where the merchants show enterprise and push in the matter of advertising is apt to be the same town where the stores have good success in holding the home trade.

A Swede in Minnesota took out a membership in the Farm Bureau. About three months afterwards the department of agriculture at Washington received a letter from him: "Ay ban sign oop fur a membership en farm bureau. Not received it as yet. School tacher she ban gonn to bord at our house. My vife she vant bureau for spare bed room. Let me know how soon you vill send it." He received the following letter of recent date: "Dear Sir: In reply to yours of recent date. We have no bureaus in Washington that we can send out at this time. However we have an A No. 1 Farm Block and as soon as we can get to it, we will have it sawed up, made into a farm bureau and will send it to you."

OBITUARY

Lincoln Wesley Paul was born on Dec. 23, 1923. The 10 years, five months and five days of his brief stay on earth were days of sunshine and peace, as only a healthy boy can know them. He was finishing 4th grade work this year. He was a wideawake scholar in Sunday school and the last Sunday morning in Sunday school he answered (when questioned what lesson we might learn from Samuel) "that we served God." The Tuesday following, at 6 p. m., while near a cornsheller, a flywheel burst and one piece crushed his skull. He made a brave fight of two weeks but the odds were against him, and at nine p. m., Monday the 28th, he fell asleep. Not a word passed his lips after the accident; he made his wants known by motions.

He leaves to mourn his early departure, father, mother, six brothers three sisters, an aged grandmother, beside many relatives and friends. We, as well as those who called him their son and brother, rejoice in this dark hour that last fall during revival services he testified for Christ and with tears streaming down his little face promised to let Jesus come into his life. He shook his head in the affirmative when questioned concerning the knowledge of the presence of Christ one week before he passed away. Thus it is that "we mourn not as those who have no hope." Like a flower he has been transplanted into the garden of God where storms never beat and where sorrow and weeping are no more.

A. W. S.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express our sincerest thanks to our many kind friends and neighbors who so kindly assisted us during the accident and death of our son and brother, Lincoln. For the many kind words, sympathy and love also for the beautiful floral offerings and special singing at the home by the Sunday school class and school children.

Mr. and Mrs. C. F. W. Paul and Children.

J. Wickersheim and family left for Fort Dodge via the auto route last Saturday p. m., where they will make their future home. We regret to lose this estimable family from our midst, but wish them unbounded success in their future undertaking. Altho they resided here only about 18 months they have made many warm friends who value them sincerely and who will miss them greatly. They were both very faithful in the church work, and could always be depended upon to fill their places. May good fortune attend them in their future home.

The Commencement exercises of the high school were held in the Reformed church last Thursday evening, where a large crowd gathered to be present for the closing festivities of the school year. The class numbered seven, who were eligible for graduation, and who did good work the past year. The address was given by C. E. Gillman of Mason City, and was enjoyed by those present. The music was furnished by Dr. Jones, Jtnnie Ostendorf presiding at the organ. The Rev. Schlesselman offered prayer and the Rev. Pannkuk pronounced the benediction. Supt. Herbster presented the class and H. K. Pals, president of the board of education, awarded the diplomas.

If early indications amounts to anything at all, all of northern Iowa will be at Clear Lake Friday, June 10th. A special train over the Great Western has been scheduled from Fort Dodge, making stops at Eagle Grove, Clarion, Belmond, Swaledale and Meservey. Altho the exact running time of the train has not been announced, it will leave Fort Dodge early Friday morning, arriving at Clear Lake about ten o'clock and returning late in the evening.

Ball games have been arranged between teams from Eagle Grove, Fort Dodge and other northern Iowa towns, and town picnics will be the order of the day. Boat races, swimming events, special stunts in the open air dance pavilion and many other features for the entertainment of the visitors have been arranged for, according to Mayor Kenyon and Chas. F. Crane.

The fishing season is on and water in the lake will be ideal for bathing by that time, it is said. A special representative of the Great Western will accompany the train.—Advertisement.

MICKIE SAYS—

AUTO LICENSE LAW CHANGES MADE IN 1923

Des Moines—Changes in the state automobile law made by the 40th general assembly are embodied in copies of the law now being printed by Walter C. Ramsay, secretary of state. Altho many new provisions were proposed in bills introduced in the last legislature, the changes finally made were not far reaching.

One change provides that the owner of an automobile can recover one-half the fees he paid on his car if the car is stolen during the first half of the year, and not recovered before the end of the year for which it was licensed, or if destroyed by accident or fire. Or, if the car is sold, to be operated beyond the borders of the state, he may recover one-half the license fee. The refund, however, is not due the owner until January 1, following his loss by fire, theft or sale thereof. The provisions of the act apply to such losses as occur on or after Jan. 1, 1923. Proof must be furnished the county treasurer before such a refund is allowed.

Another change authorized by the legislature provides that the annual license fee shall be reduced in accordance with any reduction in the price of a car. The amendment in this respect says:

"When the retail price of the car is reduced below the price on file the manufacturer shall immediately notify the department, which shall issue at once to county treasurers a supplementary list of classification and on all subsequent registrations this list shall be the basis of fixing the registration fee.

"Provided further that the motor vehicle department shall leave the power to fix the license fee on all makes and models of cars which are not now furnished, or upon which the statement from the factory cannot be obtained

A section was added to the law covering stolen, embezzled or abandoned motor vehicles. This provides that an officer having such a car in his possession must notify the secretary of state and if the secretary can find the name of the owner on his lists he must notify him where the car can be found. The owner has 40 days in which to claim his car, but if he does not so claim it the car can be sold at auction, following publication of notice in a newspaper for two consecutive times. The money, after costs are deducted, goes into the general fund but the owner has six months there after to make claim to the money, which must be paid him if he makes satisfactory proof of his ownership.

The penalty for operating a car while intoxicated was made more drastic. A person thus found guilty may be fined $1,000 or imprisoned a year, or both. Under the old law such an act was a misdemeanor.

The law imposing a tax on companies operating busses or hauling freight by truck does not come under the control of the secretary of state's office. It's administration was placed in the hands of the board of railroad commissioners. The law goes into effect July 4.

FIND BABE IN RURAL BOX

The stork is now sending babies by mail, or at least that is apparantly the way one arrived at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hemphill, who live about two miles west of the Neal Anderson home in Milford township. Wednesday morning about 6:30 a member of the Hemphill family went to the mail box where they discovered a package lying on the ground, securely wrapped in a large blanket with two little ones. Upon investigation the package proved to be a baby boy clothed in a nightgown. It was about two or three months old, robust in health, uninjured by exposure to the cold, and not even hungry. Just at what time the package had been placed there is not known, but parties returning from Milford about midnight on Tuesday saw the package hanging to the mail box then. It had evidently been tied to the box with a rope, as one was hanging loose from it, but no doubt the infant had worked the the outside wrapper loose and fallen to the ground during the night.

Later—Dr. Fuller of Milford was called and the infant taken to the hospital at that place, where it was found to be in perfect health and judged to be about a month old. We understand now the baby is in the possession of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Warburton of Milford who have filed paper for application of its adoption.—Buffalo Center Tribune.

BIG SCRAP OVER ESTATE

Interest is taken in this part of Iowa in the report that the will of the late William H. Woods, formerly of Iowa Falls, will be contested by some of the heirs.

Mr. Woods was for many years prominent in banking circles in that city and accumulated an estate estimated at over $200,000.

Several years ago Mr. Woods removed to California where he died a few weeks ago. His will bequeathed his fortune to a sister, Miss Jennie Cummings, who has taken care made a home for him there and in California.

Several nephews and nieces are said to be the contestants, basing their case on the claim that Mr. Woods was of unsound mind when he made his last will which gave all to the sister.

It is stated that some years ago, Woods made a will in which the numerous nephews and nieces were remembered quite liberally, but in later years disagreement is reported to have arisen and Woods destroyed the first will and made a second in which the sister is the sole legatee.

At first action was to be brought in the county on the grounds that no will existed but later the matter was dropped and action commenced in California, based on grounds as above stated.

It is said that prior to making the will, Woods had deeded considerable realty to the sister and thata the fight to be made is on the distribution of the residue of the estate.

Let's Bury This Fellow.

The applicant was very much interested in what the medical examiner called the "expectancy of life."

"Do you think I will live to be 90, doctor?" he asked.

"How old are you now?" asked the doctor.

"Forty-five."

What is your mode of living?"

"I am single, don't smoke, drink, chew, swear, play cards or anything like that."

The medical examiner looked him over carefully, then asked:

"Why the dickens do you want to live 45 years longer?"

Here and There

Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Finn left Satday for Belmond and Fort Dodge, and Sunday they were to leave for Wyoming, where they will spend the summer. They have a homstead near Glendo, and will live on the place for a few weeks. They will return before school starts as Mrs. Finn is to teach in the Hampton schools. Mr. Finn expects to locate in Hampton, too.

Mrs. W. S. Pritchard attended the State Federation of Women's clubs at Waterloo last week. She went to Belmond and accompanied Mrs. A. E Martin and Mrs. A. W. She expects to attend.—Signal.

Dr. H. E. Meyer, who last fall severed his connection with the Hampton clinic, and since then has been leisurely touring the country, going as far west as California and incidently looking for an anchorage in a business sense, has decided to locate in Mason City and will move there this week and open office room in the M. B. A. building. The doctor is a successful practicionor and a mighty good citizen. Dr. and Mrs. Meyer have a host of friends in this community who will be delighted to learn that they are to remain residents of Iowa and within hailing distance. They have sold their fine residence to S. J. Schlesinger who will occupy it for a home.—Hampton Recorder.

Deputy Warden Ely caught a couple of Hampton parties in the last week in an attempt to carry off some undersized pike from Lake Cornelia. It cost them $5 apiece. If people will not obey the law they must suffer the consequences.—Monitor.

SELLING CARS OVERSEAS

Everywhere abroad there is an increasing demand for products of the Ford Motor Co., and it includes the whole line. During the first four months of the year foreign sales of Ford cars and trucks reached a total of 76,142. This is 34,883 more than were sold in the same period a year ago. In the same months, Fordson tractor sales mounted to 4,534, more than twice those of last year when 1,894 were sold in foreign markets.

An outstanding feature is the remarkable demand for Ford products in the Scandanavian countries. All thru Denmark, Norway and Sweden sales are showing an unprecedented increase and motor transportation in those countries is making greater strides forward than ever before. In Belgium, too, there is an unusual demand. The picturesque Belgian horse and cart is rapidly giving way to the Ford one-ton truck, for commercial and agricultural interests in Belgium now are keenly awake to the advantages and economy of this means of transportation and are turning to it in surprisingly increasing numbers.

VOL. 1 NO. 1

NOW IS THE TIME TO GET RID OF OLD ROOSTERS

As soon as the hatching season is over the old roosters should be disposed of as they are not needed for egg production. You will get just as many eggs and an infertile egg will keep much better in hot weather than a fertile one will. Iowa alone loses over $5,000,000 every year by the improper handling of eggs, so let's not have Belmond and vicinity getting in on this loss. And when selling those old roosters, bear in mind that we are in the market for them every day.

BAND CONCERT

Saturday night we will have the first street band concert. Bring in your eggs and cream, and while you listen to the band we will handle your produce for you in a pleasing and satisfactory way. Let's make Saturday night a BIG night. Bring the family, but don't forget to bring the can of cream or case of eggs to the White Produce Co. Make this your headquarters, meet your friends here; good parking place for your car in our block.

MORE EGGS

Strange as it seems, whenever a person has so much of anything they want just a little bit more. That's us. We want more eggs. We have extra help on the busy days, help that can be depended on, that know how to mandle eggs, and we doubly assure you of real service and satisfaction. We also pay the highest Cash Price that the market affords.

Remember we have a branch house at Goodell under the management o Earle E. Lateer, who is ready and willing to serve you any day and on Wednesday and Saturday nights.

The Joy of Living

by Sidney Gowing

COPYRIGHT, 1922, BY SIDNEY GOWING

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Disliking the prospect of a month's visit to her austere aunt, Lady Erythea Lambe, at Jervaulx abbey, and her cousin, Alexander Lambe, Aimee, vivacious daughter of the Very Reverend Viscount Scroope, is in a rebellious mood.

CHAPTER II.—She wanders into the park, there encountering a strange youth in trouble with a motorcycle. He laughingly introduces himself as "Billy," American. The two cement the acquaintance by a ride on the motorcycle, the "Flying Sphinx," and part. With Georgina Berners, her cousin, Aimee sets out for Jervaulx. On the way she decides that Georgina shall impersonate her at Jervaulx, while she goes on a holiday. Georgina's horrified protest is unavailing.

CHAPTER III.—Happy in her new freedom, Aimee again meets "Billy." He tells her his name is Spencer, and she gives hers as Amy Snooks, at present "out of a job." Billy offers to take her into partnership in selling the Sphinx. In a spirit of madcap adventure, she accepts. The two proceed to the town of Stanhoe, taking separate lodgings in Ivy cottage.

CHAPTER IV.—That night Aimee visits Georgina and learns that the deception has not been discovered. By her dominant personality she compels Georgina to continue the subterfuge.

CHAPTER V.—On a trial spin next day on the Sphinx, with Billy, Aimee almost collides with a carriage in which are her aunt, Georgina and Alexander. The pair escape unrecognized.

CHAPTER VI.—Georgina learns that Lord Scroope is coming to visit Lady Erythea and, realizing what will happen on his arrival, is in hopeless bewilderment.

CHAPTER VII.—While Aimee is secretly visiting Georgina at Jervaulx, the place is burglarized. Aimee escapes.

CHAPTER VIII.—Georgina learns, with much relief, that Aimee has got away.

CHAPTER IX.—Police Inspector Panke decides that the robbery is the work of "Jack the Climber" and "Calamity Kate," noted thieves, who travel on a motorcycle.

CHAPTER X.—Billy, aware of his "partner's" nocturnal jaunts, is troubled. He follows her, on the Sphinx, to Jervaulx. He hears the commotion, at once suspects burglary, and follows two figures on a motorcycle who are apparently in a desperate hurry. Cornering the pair, Billy knocks out a man who attempts to shoot him, picking up a package the fellow had dropped. He discovers the other fugitive to be a woman. Stopping to aid her, she strikes him with a stone, rendering him unconscious, and the pair escape.

CHAPTER XI.—Recovering, Billy discovers the package he had picked up is a jewel case, containing emeralds. Realizing they must be part of the loot from Jervaulx, he starts for the abbey. On the way he meets Aimee, with the police in pursuit. In a secure hiding place, a cave among the crag pits, Aimee tells him the whole story. He urges that she make a frank confession to her father, but on reflection both realize Aimee's good name has been compromised by her two nights' stay at Ivy cottage.

CHAPTER XII.—Assuring Aimee he has a plan to save her, Billy leaves her in the cave and, proceeding to Jervaulx, restores the emeralds to the astounded Lady Erythea.

CHAPTER XIII.—Rejecting any reward, after explaining how the emeralds came into his possession, Billy accepts the position of chauffeur to Lady Erythea, seeing in the situation a promise of a way out of the embroglio.

CHAPTER XIV.—Realizing what her father's visit to Jervaulx would mean, Aimee goes secretly to her home, disables the family auto, thus preventing his journey, and induces a parlormaid to let her take her place at Jervaulx.

CHAPTER XV.—Alexander recognizes Aimee as the woman on the motorcycle which ran into the Lambe carriage, denouncing her as "Calamity Kate." Georgina divulges Aimee's identity. Hearing her story, Alexander consents to keep the secret.

"In all my life I never saw such a lot of frumps. And the taste it leaves in one's mouth—it's awful. It's all very well sitting tight and saying nothing. I shall break out—I know I shall, unless I can see Billy soon."

She observed a large photograph of the Rev. and Hon. Alexander Lambe, in an ornate silver frame, standing on a table. Aimee recognized the portrait, and flicked at it viciously with the feather brush. She miscalculated, the portrait crashed on to the floor. When she picked it up the glass was shattered.

"That's torn it. All breakages come off my wages. I wish it had been his silly face!"

At that moment Miss Georgina Berners entered by one of the French windows. She was aware of a slimmer and more youthful figure than any she had yet seen in the household. Georgina made a point of always being civil to her hostess' servants.

"Are you the new parlor maid?" she said amiably.

Aimee turned and faced her.

"Hullo, Georgie!" she exclaimed.

Georgina, during the last three days, had suffered more than any placid soul should be called upon to endure. She stared wildly for a moment at the slim form in the cap and apron. Georgina had arrived at the breaking-point. She collapsed backwards into an armchair; a series of shrill whoops came from her; her hands beat the air.

"Georgina!" cried her cousin in a panic. "For pity's sake don't do that. You'll give the whole show away!"

"Honk! Honk! Honk!" said Georgina.

Aimee had once heard a physician declare that sympathy and kindness merely made hysterics worse. It was time to change the treatment. She grabbed her cousin by the shoulders.

"Shut up that beastly row!" said Aimee fiercely, shaking her till her teeth rattled. "Stop it! Do you want to get me handcuffed and put in the cells? Idiot!"

Georgina gasped, choked, and sat up. She clung to her cousin desperately.

"I will be quiet. I will," she said faintly. "Wh-wha-what does it mean, Aimee? Why—?"

"Try to behave like a reasonable being, and I'll tell you."

"Yes, yes! I'm better now, dear."

Aimee inspected her and, judging the danger to be past, kissed her affectionately. After a cautious glance at the windows she proceeded, as Billy would have phrased it, to put her cousin wise.

Georgina, having heard her to the end, pressed both hands pathetically to the sides of her head.

"And—you're living in the servants' hall?" she said feebly.

"It's no catch, I can tell you, Georgie. But one mustn't grumble. Billy's living at the garage—in a green uniform with brass buttons."

"That—that extraordinarily good-looking young chauffeur?" said Georgina, staring at her. "Then he is—"

"Now don't get sentimental," said Aimee warningly. "Yes, he is not bad-looking, is he? Billy's great. If it hadn't been for him—" she checked herself. "Don't you see what an excellent arrangement it is, my being here—in spite of the little drawbacks?"

Georgina gave a sigh—positively of relief.

"It's better than having you wandering about the country, getting into all sorts of horrible scrapes. It will have to come out soon, and then Lady Erythea—"

"Yes, yes. Never mind Aunt. What I want you to do, Georgie, is this—oh, bother! Look out!"

Aimee seized her brush and, darting to the sideboard, began dusting busily. A step was heard on the gravel, and Mr. Alexander Lambe entered by the window.

"Cousin Aimee, you are looking pale," he said in tones of concern. "It is delightful out of doors, the air is so balmy. Shall we—er—take a little walk in the rose—"

Alexander stopped short, and his features froze. He had caught sight of Aimee's face, with the light full upon it, reflected in the mirror before her. He stared for a moment with remarkable intentness.

"Who is this?" he said sharply, stepping towards her. There was menace in his voice. "Who are you?"

Aimee, preparing to meet her destiny, turned composedly and faced him. She dropped him a small curtsey.

"Please sir, the parlor maid," she said.

Mr. Lambe's eyes were nearly starting out of his head.

"Parlor maid? You?" he said sternly. "You are the woman who drove that motorcycle. I could vouch for you anywhere. You are"—he shot the words out with extraordinary vehemence—"you are that abandoned creature, Calamity Kate! You are the woman who knocked me down!"

With unexpected agility he sprang forward and seized Aimee by the wrist. And with equal deftness she wrenched herself free.

"Am I?" she said fiercely. "Then keep your hands off me, or I'll do it again. Do you hear me?"

Aimee, thoroughly roused, flourished the feather brush in his face. Mr. Lambe started back, a little pale. He placed his thumb on the bell-push.

"Aimee," he said sharply, "go out—go out quickly! I will deal with her."

"What are you going to do?" gasped Georgina. Instead of obeying him she came forward, trembling.

"Go out! I am going to give this woman in charge!"

"In pity's name, don't do that!" Georgina gulped, and struggled for breath. "She—she is your kik-kik-Cousin Aimee!"

Georgina dropped into a chair and began to cry. Alexander, taking his hand from the bell, wondered if she had suddenly become insane.

"Quite right," said Aimee. With the calm of despair she planted herself in front of him, her eyes defiant. "I am your kik-kik-Cousin Aimee. And that's my cousin, Georgina Berners. I made her take my place here, because I thought it would be dull, and Dad insisted on my coming. So now call the police, Cousin Alick, and let's get it over."

It seemed to Alexander that he had suddenly been transported into Bedlam. He stared from Aimee to the gently sobbing Georgina. And then, as the door began to open, Mr. Lambe turned swiftly and caught the handle, preventing the intruder from entering.

"Did you ring, miss?" inquired Mr. Tarbeaux's voice.

Aimee Flourished the Feather Brush In His Face.

"A mistake," said Alexander, quickly. "I will ring if I want you." He closed the door, and peered searchingly at Aimee.

"I do not understand what this means," he said coldly, "but it does not seem an occasion for the intrusion of servants. We are alone. Will you explain?"

Aimee felt a sudden relief; a twinge almost of gratitude. She had not expected Alexander to do anything so sensible.

"I'll make it clear if I can," she said, and, looking Alexander in the face with an angelically simple expression, she told him the tale from the beginning, briefly, yet comprehensively. As she was speaking, Aimee watched Mr. Lambe's face. The waves of emotion that passed over his usually serene features made them interesting, suggesting some delicate instrument subjected to shocks for which it had never been designed. At the end he was gasping faintly, like a stranded but still dignified fish.

"And so," concluded Aimee, "you see it's a piece of my skirt the police have got. And it was I who tripped you up the stairs. I'm sorry—Cousin."

Mr. Lambe passed a somewhat unsteady hand across his forehead. He looked at Aimee, and then turned slowly to Georgina.

"Miss Berners—" he said.

Georgina's answer was a sob. Immediately Aimee stepped across, raised her from her chair and, with an arm round her waist, faced Alexander.

"Stop! Not a word from you to Georgina!" she said defiantly. "There's no one to blame but me. Everything she's done, I made her do. She wanted me to own up. All this, she's done to try and save me. Georgie's the best thing that ever happened."

Alexander looked at Aimee.

"My dear child," he said gently, "I have only one wish and that is to help you."

Aimee's lips parted; she stared at him incredulously. She saw the most human sympathy in the clean-shaven, priestly face; the kindliest light in his large eyes.

"Miss Berners," said Alexander, still more gently, "will you leave me with your cousin? I should like to speak to her alone. I will see you presently, if you will give me an opportunity."

Georgina nodded brokenly, and moved to the window.

"Georgie," whispered Aimee quickly, as she passed, "meet me by the little arbor down the gardens in half an hour—it won't be safe here—after this."

Aimee and Alexander were left together, facing each other. There was an embarrassed pause.

"Tell me, Cousin," said Alexander, quietly, "why have you done this mad thing?"

"Well," said Aimee, for once at a loss, "I—you see—I was afraid of you, Alexander." She glanced up at him almost shyly. "I didn't want to come to Jervaulx. I thought it would suit Georgie much better than me."

Alexander's firm lips twitched very slightly.

"I got fed up at home," continued Aimee, desperately. "Everybody was so solemn. They drove me to it! I just did it on the impulse. And then I—things sort of happened—I—"

She made an impatient, hopeless gesture with her hands.

'Oh, what's the use of talking about it? It's done, and here I am in this wretched mess. Police after me, and—everything! You've found me out—you can give me away. What are you going to do?"

"There is only one thing to do," said Alexander. "Make a clean breast of it."

Aimee's lips tightened.

"Come with me to Aunt Erythea," said Mr. Lambe soothingly. "I will accompany you. I'll do everything I can for you. There is no other way. For I can see," he said, "that you have courage."

"No," said Aimee decisively, "it is impossible."

Alexander's eyes became keener. He looked a little contemptuous.

"Are you afraid?" he said. "Do you not see that you must face the consequences of this foolish thing you have done? Once the truth is told, you have nothing to fear from the police."

"The police!" said Aimee scornfully. 'I'm not afraid of the police. I'm not much afraid of Aunt Erythea. It isn't that at all. It's—the other thing."

"What other thing?"

Aimee looked at him with growing embarrassment.

"Oh!" she said at last, desperately, "have I got to put it in so many words? My staying at Ivy cottage! Didn't you understand what I told you? I was there—two nights."

Mr. Lambe, to her surprise, did not look forbidding or censorious. Instead, he looked a little puzzled. And in that moment Aimee conceived a liking for Alexander.

"Now that I have seen you, and heard your story," he said, "I attach no importance to that incident, whatever."

"Ah," said Aimee sadly, "but other people will, you see."

Alexander suddenly flushed crimson, and he avoided Aimee's eye. But his face grew peculiarly grim.

"I have only this to say. That man—that Spencer—who dared to expose you to such a situation, is the culprit I wish to see. He deserves—"

Aimee's heel smote the floor.

"Not a word against Billy! It's he who saved me, right from the beginning. He begged me to let him own up. But he has kept my secret, at his own risk, because I wanted it kept. He is a gentleman!"

Alexander winced. At that moment, out of the tail of her eye, Aimee caught sight of a tall figure in overalls crossing the gravel-walk beyond the lawn.

"Here he is!" exclaimed Aimee. "Let him answer for himself, if you want to see him."

She ran to the window and called recklessly:

"Billy!"

Mr. William Spencer looked towards her, glanced quickly left and right to see if the coast was clear, and hurried to join Aimee. He stepped in through the window.

"Billy," said Aimee, "this is my Cousin Alexander. And he's—he knows all about it. It seems this is our finish, Billy."

The two men turned and faced each other.

CHAPTER XVI

"They Must Be Told."

Mr. Lambe's serious eyes had become hard and penetrating as a pair of crystal lenses. They gave the impression of piercing the exterior of the man before him, and reading his mind. Alexander looked, at that moment, rather like an inquisitor of Torquemada's court.

"You are Mr. William Spencer?" said Alexander icily.

"That's so. You don't know me? I guessed you wouldn't. But I remember you very well, though I never connected your name till now," said Billy calmly. "You were chaplain to the Tenth Rutlands, in 1918. Came from China to join 'em, I heard."

Mr. Lambe was silent.

"I was a sub in the Ninety-seventh of the line, lying next the British Seventieth division at Arras," added Billy. "I remember you because you brought in six wounded who got left, after the raid on the pillboxes. Two of them were ours. You got the military brass."

Aimee stared at Alexander in blank amazement.

"That will do," interrupted Mr. Lambe impatiently. "We are not dealing with the war. Do you realize," he said in his grimmest tone, "the position in which you have placed this lady?"

Billy looked straight at him.

"You are Miss Scroope's cousin," he said quietly, "and a parson. I guess I'll take lying down, from you, anything you choose to say or do. Of course I realize it, and it's why I'm here. I've been a fool. I didn't seem to know. But I ought to have known."

He sighed.

"Things are so different, where I belong. An' they were different in France—mighty different. But that's no excuse. I wish I'd broken my neck before I did such a fool thing. And here we are in the soup. I don't matter. And you don't matter either, parson. All that matters is Miss Scroope. Get me?"

"Come here," said Alexander.

He took Billy by the arm, led him to the window, and turned him so that the sun shone full on his face. Mr. Lambe looked at Billy for some moments in silence, with a peculiar intentness.

"Mr. Spencer," said Alexander, releasing him, "I will see you presently. I shall have something to say to you. For the moment, leave me with my cousin. And—go quickly!"

Billy nodded. He turned to Aimee with a smile.

"Don't you worry," he said quietly, "the padre's white."

Billy disappeared with extreme suddenness through the window. Alexander came slowly up to Aimee.

"That young man," he said, "has the heart of a child. It is a good thing to have. And rare, at his age. That does not alter the fact that your situation is dangerous, and even terrible. My decision is final," he said earnestly. "There is but one thing to do. The plain, honest course. Aunt Erythea must be told immediately. Then you will be safe."

"And I repeat it's impossible," returned Aimee quickly. "Can't you see? You understand. And Georgie understands. But there is one who will never understand. My father. He doesn't belong to our time. He'll consider only one thing—that his daughter has been disgraced before all the county. Her name a by-word among the rabble. That's how he'll take it. It will simply be Dad's finish."

Aimee sniffed miserably.

"I never thought about it. But Georgie told me what it would mean to my father. And she's right. You don't know Dad."

Alexander had turned rather white. He walked to the door and back, in some agitation.

"It is some years since I have seen your father. But I knew him very well. And I believe you are right. This would be a heavy blow to him. But—it has got to be faced."

"And I will not let Dad face it!" said Aimee hotly. "I don't care, for myself. But I'm not going to have him made miserable—for all the parsons in the country!"

"You have no choice. You do not suppose for a moment this thing can be concealed and overcome!"

Aimee turned to him with supreme confidence.

"Of course I do. Billy will see it through!" she said triumphantly.

Alexander gasped.

"I cannot countenance deceit. The whole thing is known to me—my position is impossible," he said. "I should be abetting a lie."

"There's no need for you to do anything at all. Nobody wanted you to butt in, Alexander. The secret is mine, not yours. Go to Aunt Erythea, if you must!" said Aimee bitterly. "Oh, I'm not complaining—I can see that you must. Only you'll do it without my sanction. Go to her, and tell her all you know about me."

Alexander groaned. For awhile he was silent. The perspiration stood out on his forehead. The anguish in his face was so plain that even Aimee felt compunction.

Alexander sighed aloud.

"I shall keep silence," he said. "It is impossible for me to betray a woman's secret without her consent—or to utter one word that may affect her reputation. But what will come of it—"

"Ah!" said Aimee eagerly, "you need know nothing at all. Whatever happens, I'll keep you out of it."

"On the contrary! I implore you, whatever difficulty arises, to come to me. I—I will do all I can." He gulped. "I want to help you, Aimee."

Aimee seized his hands in hers.

"Alexander," she cried breathlessly, "I am sorry I knocked you down!"

The next moment she had fled through the window.

* * * * * * * *

Half an hour later Aimee, a somewhat furtive figure, was dodging to and fro on the path near the little arbor in the rose garden, keeping an anxious eye on all the approaches from the house. She was still feeling a little confused.

"Who would ever have dreamed he was such a good sort as that!" she said to herself. "It's a delirious sort of mess I've got them both into. I hope he won't jump on poor Georgie. Why on earth doesn't she hurry up? There she is—oh bother!—Alexander again!"

Aimee retreated out of sight into the arbor.

Georgina came slowly along the path, her countenance pale and downcast, like a recalcitrant novice who fears the Lady Superior. Mr. Alexander Lambe, looming through the forest of standard roses, quickly overtook her.

"Miss Berners!"

Georgina turned to him with frightened eyes.

"I wish to speak with you," said Alexander with suppressed agitation. "Shall we be seated?" He led her to a rustic seat close against the arbor.

"It distresses me," said Mr. Lambe earnestly, "to see, as I cannot help seeing, the effect this has had upon you. The shock to your sensibility. Let me set your mind at rest, as far as I can. I hardly dare to think how it will all end. But your cousin is as innocent as an infant of any real intent to deceive. She has behaved as inconsequently as a child—that is all. One—one must try to make allowances for her. She should be still at school. That is what I think of her."

"Yes," murmured Georgina miserably, "but what must you think of—me!"

"Of you!" said Mr. Lambe with strong feeling. "Your loyalty—your unflinching attachment to that young madcap, stirs my admiration. It is dreadful to think of what you must have suffered. Purely to protect Aimee. You faced my aunt." Mr. Lambe clasped his hand and drew his breath in sharply. "Yes, you risked the displeasure of my aunt! And—of course, the police. For days this sword of Damocles has been hanging over your blameless head. You—you have not been guilty of deceit. No, no! Only of silence. I think you have behaved, on the whole, admirably."

"Oh!" gasped Georgia faintly, hardly daring to believe her ears, "you cannot mean it!"

"I do mean it!" exclaimed Mr. Lambe warmly. "Miss Berners, from the first hour I saw you, I was convinced of your—your essential goodness! It betrays itself in all that you do. Anything that is underhand or questionable, glides away from you—" proclaimed Mr. Lambe, with a sweeping movement of his hand, "as the turbid stream flows over the riverbed of white marble, leaving its purity unsullied. My admiration for you is greater, if that is possible, than ever."

Georgina's heart fluttered delightfully.

"I think," continued Alexander, with growing enthusiasm, "that you exist to sacrifice yourself for others, Miss Berners. You have more than piety—you have charity. It is one of the sweetest qualities in a woman."

Georgina turned to him with swimming eyes.

"Oh, Mr. Lambe!" she murmured with delicious confusion.

Alexander answered her with a hollow groan. She was startled at the sudden distress in his face.

"The question is not what I think of you," he said bitterly, "but what you think of me! You know the principles I profess, and that I impressed on you. Out of my own mouth I am condemned. How can you feel anything but contempt for me! I have consented to connive at this mad escapade of Aimee's and all its consequences. To keep silent. To—to bolster it up," he said with a gulp. "I have passed my word."

Georgina's eyes shone.

"You have done that!" she cried eagerly. "Why, now that you are on her side, she may be saved from exposure after all! I think it is splendid of you—absolutely splendid!"

"How can you think of me, but as a hypocrite? You do not mean, Miss Berners, that you feel any respect for me now?"

"Mr. Lambe, when I first knew you, I thought you my ideal as a churchman. I think so more than ever. When I was in trouble, and consulted you, I seemed to find you a little hard. Poor Aimee had enough to bear. But now," gasped Georgina, quite carried away, "I consider your conduct noble—really noble! I admire you more than ever."

"Miss Berners," said Alexander, husky with emotion, "if only you knew what a relief it is, that I have not forfeited your regard! I have only known you a few days, but your kindness, your sympathy—" his hand closed almost convulsively on hers—"Miss Berners, may I call you Aimee—I—I mean Georgina—!"

"Poof!"

A stifled, explosive sound caused Mr. Lambe to start violently and look round him.

"What was that? A dog?" he said confusedly.

Georgina, pink to the ears, had risen to her feet; her eyes shone somewhat viciously.

"It sounded to me more like a cat!" she said in acid tones, and walked away down the path.

Mr. Lambe followed her.

When they were out of sight, the parlor maid emerged from the little arbor, her face crimson, her shoulders shaking, a handkerchief pressed to her streaming eyes.

"Poor old Georgie!" she gasped. "I couldn't help it. I should have burst in another minute."

She squeezed the handkerchief and controlled her emotion.

"They'll have a jolly old tangle to unpick, too, when Aunt knows!" she said thoughtfully.

"No use stopping here. I suppose I'd better finish my dusting."

Aimee made a circuitous journey to the deserted drawing room, and dusted with the energy of a high-power machine. The room was not much the better for it. She was only just in time, for the housekeeper appeared, and after some sour comments, stood by her while she did a good deal of the work over again. Then Aimee was marshaled into the library, to dust that.

The library overlooked the path leading to the garage. It was some forty minutes later that Aimee caught sight of the chauffeur approaching. She flung down her duster and ran to the window, giving a cautious whistle, as a poacher who calls his dog.

Billy made sure that the coast was clear, and came to her window. He looked at her and laughed joyously.

"The clouds have rolled by, partner!" he said.

"What has happened? Have you seen Alexander?"

"Sure. Just had a pow-wow with him in the garage."

"What did he say to you?" asked Aimee quickly.

Billy eyed her thoughtfully.

"Never you mind. The game's square. The padre's all wool and a yard wide. You're all right now. Unless—"

"But the police! Suppose they trace us and come back here?"

"They may not. I b'lieve I see a way through it. And I've all the time off, this evening. You sit tight."

"But if they come here!"

"Then they'll get me," said Billy, "but they won't get you; you're safe from the cops, anyhow. I promise you that."

Aimee leaned out of the window, with flushed cheeks, and caught his hands in hers.

Another Building To Be Built Soon

Art Hill To Erect New Modern Building On Lot Where Garage Burned.

OTHERS ARE IN PROSPECT

It is understood that Art Hill will erect a fine new modern building on his lot on Main street, where his garage burned down in the recent big fire. Work, it is understood is to commence on the building at once, and it is to be completed by October 1. Mr. Hill plans to put up a fire proof structure, of fire proof material. The front end of the new building is to be occupied by the Jones Harness company, and Elmer Boughton has rented the building where the former is now located, to move in when the new building is completed.

W. H. Wolle anticipates building a new office on his old site, destroyed in the fire, and plans to start the work in the near future.

Here is a resolution with teeth in it, issued by the board of supervisors of Ida county, "Notice is hereby given that all signs must be removed from the public highway in Ida county, on or before the 15th day of June, 1923. No signs will be permitted within the legal distance from the public highway, except those authorized by the board of supervisors and the location by the county engineer. If said signs are not removed on or before the above date, they will be removed by the employees of the county."

IOWA HENS COULD PAY BONUS BONDS IN A HALF YEAR

The Iowa hen will lay enough eggs in six months to pay the entire soldier bonus of $22,000,000 at prices now prevailing, says R. G. Clark, head of the dairy and food division of the state department of Agriculture. "Or the Iowa cow will produce enough butter in five months to do the trick," he added.

"This is providing, of course, that the Iowa hen and the Iowa cow are patriotic individuals, and it all goes to show that Iowa resources are tremendous as compared to meager expenditures of $22,000,000 for soldier compensation and the like."

The Iowa hen produced $51,376,000 worth of eggs during 1921 and $43,539,672 worth of eggs in 1922. The production is on the increase so that an even larger value than the figures for 1922 show can be with safety prophesied for 1923. The production in 1922 was 159,711,000 dozens as compared to 133,100,000 dozens in 1921, but the price of eggs was considerably higher two years ago.

The Iowa cow produced 124,168,089 pounds of butter during 1922 which sold for $58,462,805.12, and this was creamery butter alone. All of the thousands of pounds of butter made by the farmer's wife in an old fashioned churn for home consumption and for sale in the neighboring town are not even mentioned in this compilation.

$5,000 FARM FIRE LOSS.

Chris Schutt, a farmer near Woolstock, suffered a loss of around $5,000 in a disasterous fire last week. The fire, started by the small children of Schutt, who were playing with matches in the barn, burned the large horse barn, machine shed and chicken house, a fine mare, about 25 hogs, all the harness and some of the hay. The wind was just right to carry the flames directly to the residence, and only by hard work on the part of neighbors was the house and furniture saved. One thousand dollars in insurance was carried.

ANNUAL PICNIC

The ladies of the Progress club are planning for their big annual picnic, which will be held next week Tuesday, June 19. The club always has a highly enjoyable time at these affairs, and doubtless the one next week will be as good as those of the past.

Come in to the first band concert of the season next Saturday evening.

DISTRICT COURT NOTES

At Monday's board meeting the supervisors instructed Engineer Hilton to go ahead with the preliminary work on the following highways: To drain, grade and gravel the remaining mile of county road south of Clarion; to grade and drain one mile of the same road to the north of Clarion; to drain and grade the mile of road north from the Clarion cemetery. These improvements not only concern Clarion but the entire traveling public, for all are county roads and subject to a great deal of travel.

The following couples were granted licenses to wed during the past week: Gerhard Carlyle Johnson of Belmond and Anna Mae Aldrich of Clarion; Lisle Ernest Goslin and Lura Teressa Campbell, both of Clarino; William L. Castleman and Edna Grove, of Clarion.

Last week J. K. Hilton, county engineer, received notice of his election to membership in the American Society of Civil Engineers. It is the oldest engineering society in the United States, having been organized prior to the Civil war. Character and ability as well as scholarship are required of all applicants, who must have the endorsement of several members in good standing. It is readily understood that the society stands for the best in engineering when it is known that prior to this year only two county engineers in Iowa were members. Friends of Mr. Hilton rejoice at his election to membership.

A Mexican, formerly of Belmond, who escaped from the Cherokee authorities, was captured near Dows last week and returned to that institution.

Sheriff Langs office has been putting in considerable time the past few weeks checking up the delinquent auto list turned over by Treasurer Allen. The list included over one hundred cars. Of that number the sheriff finds that fully one-half have been junked and no report made of the same. Others have removed from the county without giving the required notice.

Albert Ohlsen, who was serving a five year term at Anamosa for the theft of an automobile, was paroled to Harry Enfield, a farmer near Goldfield. They could not get along so Mr. Enfield brought the man to town and turned him over to the officers. Sheriff Lang was notified to get the prisoner and although he lost no time in reaching Goldfield the manhad deliberately walked to the edge of town where he caught an auto ride and that was the last heard of him. He onlyhad fifteen months of his sentence left to serve.

Four appraisements were made Monday by the inheritance commission as follows;

The estate of John Robinson of Eagle Grove was valued at $68,874. Of this sum $6000 consisted of real estate and the balance cash, notes and mortages. Mr. Robinson was employed on the Northwestern section for several years.

From the fact that Mr. and Mrs. M. C. Lester of Clarion did not take out adoption papers at the time they took Mrs. R. P. Osier into their home makes his estate come under the jurisdiction of the inheritance tax law. The Clarion residence is valued at $4000 and Mrs. Lester is given life lease in the same.

John Erickson estate at Dows has been appraised at $39,389. His real estate is valued at $8,800, his residence at $7000 and the personal property, notes and certificates of deposit, $7589.

The real property of the late W. H. Milnes of Clarion has been appraised at $8000. It includes the home property, a tenant house and a couple of vacant lots. The amount of personal property in cash, notes and bonds is $46,345.--Monitor.

Eagle Grove Times:--At a meeting of the board of supervisors to be held Friday a resolution will probably be passed calling an election to be held to get an opinion of the voters of the county on gravelling the roads which were graded last year. A bond issue of about $200,000 will be asked to complete around 90 miles of road in the county which were brought to a grade last year. The cost of gravelling roads in Wright county has averaged approximately $2,700 per mile.

Attorney General Gibson has ruled that the Truck law, one of the important enactments of the Fortieth General Assembly, will not affect contracts let before July 4, 1923. Under this law the county expenditures are limited to collectionable revenues for the year. When the board of supervisors let the contract for grading these county roads they expected to be able to issue bonds to gravel them this year. Under Attorney General Gibson's ruling they could go ahead and contract for the graveling, but on account of the law going into effect next month, they prefer to get the issue approved by the taxpayers of the county.

The supervisors have had requests from a number of farmers living along the roads which were graded last year to gravel them.

Unless a bond issue can be voted no money will be available for graveling for several years and by that time much of the grading will have to be done over again.

Howard Hutcheson of Clarion was taken to Eldora Tuesday by Deputy Johnson. He had been previously paroled to G. R. Hill and last week broke the same by running away to Tama. He had committed other offenses against the parole, which caused Judge McCall to revoke the same.

Sheriff Lang held three mortgage sales Monday. The first at 10 A. M. when he sold the property of Theresa and Burr Stewart to satisfy a claim of nearly $8000 held by the Farmers State Savings bank ofDows. At 11 o'clock the judgment of the Stoughton Wagon Co. for $2230 against Mr. and Mrs. Fabian Beckett was satisfied. The foreclosure sale of State Savings bank of Rowan vs. Frank and Gertrude Toyne came at 2 p. m. This involved $13,337.82.

County Engineer Hilton has sent out notice to all patrolmen and road draggers calling their attention to the necessity of keeping railroad crossings free from stone and gravel and thus prevent a possible derailment. In other words, "Safety first."

R. W. and Alcinda Frank are named as defendants in a suit brought by Ross & Maurer of Renwick, who are engaged in the grocery business. They hold a promisory note for $1650 given in July, 1921. On this past due note they ask judgment for $1941.50.

Ellen McCallum of Belmond will ask for a divorce from her husband, Archiebald McCallum at the October term of court. She alleges cruel and inhuman treatment; failure to support herself and minor children; excessive use of intoxicating liquors and constant abuse. The couple were married at Belmond in June, 1900, and have eight children, three of whom the mother asks the custody.
